An Edison Phonograph means A Merry Christmas for Every Member of the Family

For Father

who comes home tired but eager to be amused, who cannot afford the theatre for himself, to say nothing for a large family, who enjoys the old ballads such as "Robin Adair," "Highland Mary," "Annie Laurie," and "Home Sweet Home," the Edison Phonograph is an ideal Christmas present because it gives him the music that he loves, sung by great singers, at a less expense than attendance at theatre or concert, and by his own fireside.

For Mother who loves sacred music and who does not often have an opportunity to hear "The Palms," "Holy City," "Gates Ajar," or "Lead, Kindly Light," as sung by the great tenors and sopranos of the city churches, but who can enjoy this music at home with the aid of an Edison Phonograph just as often and just as fully as she cares to listen, and who will find in the ownership of an Edison Phonograph and the Records that she loves a perpetual reminder of the affection of the family that presented them to her.

For Big Brother who would go to the musical comedy and variety show oftener if he could, and who likes the sort of things a fellow can whistle, and wants to hear "Hello People," or "The Glow Worm," or "Cuddle Up a Little Closer," or something of that kind, the way they sing it at the shows or at the halls, and who could hear these things that way, because an Edison Record faithfully reproduces the exact mannerisms of the singer as, for instance, in the Harry Lauder Records, if he could only be so fortunate as to get an Edison Phonograph for Christmas.

For the Children

because each and every one of them—bless their hearts—enjoy music, especially the kind of music they can march by or sing to, and because one Phonograph will delight and entertain an entire circle of children, so that absolutely the best Christmas present for every member of the family and for the whole family is an Edison Phonograph.

Edison Phonographs are sold at the same price everywhere in the United States, $12.50 to $125.00

Edison Standard Records, 35c. Edison Amberol Records (play twice as long), 50c.
Edison Grand Opera Records, 75c. and $1.00

There are Edison dealers everywhere. Go to the nearest and hear the Edison Phonograph play both Edison Standard and Amberol Records. Get complete catalogs of Phonographs and Records, from your dealer or from us.

American Boy

Biggest, brightest and best magazine for boys in all the world. You need never worry about your boy's company when he is chumming with The American Boy. It is the greatest adjunct to refined home training. Wins every boy's confidence and enthusiasm. Bright, breezy stories of adventure, travel, history, biography and world events, beautifully illustrated. Proper amount of sports and games, and practical departments of photography, electricity, stamps, curios, carpentry, mechanics, how to do things, how to make things. Is doing more for the healthy entertainment and uplift of boys than any other single influence. Has the enthusiastic support of over 250,000 boys, and their parents thoroughly respect it for the good it does their boys. Give your boy a magazine of his own.

American Magazine

Is selected by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this year as one of the leaders in its club offers because of the illustrious group of writers announced for the coming year. F. P. Dunne ("Mr. Dooley"), Ida M. Tarbell, William Allen White, Samuel Hopkins Adams, William J. Locke, May Sinclair, Stewart Edward White, Ray Stannard Baker and O. Henry are a few among the many. Every number of The American Magazine contains the best that can be gotten from the pens of the greatest writers—literature that lives and breathes and spurs to better living—illustrations that are true to life and nature. It is a new magazine in every sense—new writers, new subjects, new artists and new fiction—and an appeal to the mind and heart that is new in periodical literature.

Cosmopolitan

Cosmopolitan Magazine is the one great magazine of all the great national monthlies. No matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1910 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by George Randolph Chester, or the intensely interesting adventure story by E. Phillips Oppenheim. "The best, no matter what it costs" is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

Good Housekeeping Magazine is a richly illustrated monthly, the one magazine which has popularized household science and homemaking in a broad sense. It is the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest and most refreshing of periodicals for general reading, its fiction and discussions of current issues being particularly good. It is an all-around family magazine, which renders home-making a pleasure. How to secure the most and the best for the money in home furnishing and equipment, and in food supply, is among its specialities. Its greatly enlarged Household Experiment Station, Model Kitchen and Testing Room of household appliances is a national institution. Special attention is given to health, to children, to needlework, and stenciling.

Harper's Bazar

Beginning with the Christmas number of 1909, Harper's Bazar goes into its superb new, enlarged and improved form. It will be bigger than ever before. It will be better than ever before. It will be more interesting than ever before. It will be more helpful than ever before. It will be indispensable to every thoughtful woman whose ambition is to make the most of life for herself and for her family. It will "set the fashion." It will continue to be the supreme authority on questions of good form, household decoration, entertainment, and practical and domestic topics of every kind. It will have the best short stories, the best pictures, the best essays, the best poems to be found in any woman's magazine.

NOTE—The descriptive matter on this page concerning the above magazines is supplied by their respective publishers for the information of our readers.

For Home Reading or for Holiday Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A beautifully illustrated monthly magazine for children from three to thirteen. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and, above all, true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also playwork for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

Mr. S. S. McClure, editor of McClure's Magazine, is one of the greatest magazine editors in America and a man of national reputation. Speaking of McClure's Magazine, he said recently: "I shall continue to spend more and more money—to give my readers a better and better magazine. McClure's Magazine for the next year will be more intensely interesting, and will exert a more potent influence on American life than any other magazine. It will be the best twelve numbers of any magazine in America." McClure's is always a step in advance of other magazines. Besides the articles on government, politics, people and things, McClure's is also famous for its fiction. The coming numbers will make new history for McClure's. You'll want them surely.

Pearson's Magazine

One-half is for information on subjects in which you are interested; that means home subjects, the things that American people are thinking and talking about. Once in a while some foreign matter may be discussed, but only in its relation to Americans and only when it means something to America. During the coming year informative articles on subjects which mean something to the average man will be written, in every case by the writer best qualified for the matter. The other half of the magazine is for entertainment, purely and simply. Pearson's Magazine is famous in two hemispheres for its fiction. It gets the best that is written. There is a continual and urgent demand from the newspapers for Pearson's stories. Do you want this sort of a magazine?

Review of Reviews

Fifty Magazines Condensed—More Necessary Than Ever.

In a single number of The Review of Reviews there are sixty topics, every one of real, immediate interest to every intelligent man and woman, discussed and interpreted by Dr. Albert Shaw, his staff, and his contributors; there are one hundred pictures that really illustrate and inform, including the cartoon department, which amuses into the bargain; there are fifty magazines and leading articles skilfully condensed, and scores of the new books reviewed. "The Review of Reviews is a liberal education," is the way one eminent subscriber sums it up. The more things that happen—the more magazines there are—the more indispensable is The Review of Reviews. Busy men and women want it, need it, read it. Why not you?

Woman's Home Companion

The greater Woman's Home Companion will be the most interesting, the most useful and the most beautiful woman's magazine published. There will be fiction by Anna Katherine Green, Juliet Wilbur Tompkins, Anne Warner, Myra Kelly, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and a host of others. There will be special articles no woman will want to miss. With nearly a score of different practical departments for women Woman's Home Companion can promise the most useful woman's magazine in the world. In short, The Companion will have more stories than the fiction magazines, more pictures than the picture magazines, and more practical departments than any other magazine.

World Evangel

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are Sunday School teachers or scholars should not fail to include The World Evangel in their combination magazine orders. The Evangel is the leading Sunday School magazine. It makes teaching delightful and effective, its fund of anecdotes enabling the teacher to interest scholars of all grades. Its lesson study department provides the best available exposition and information, and its lesson-teaching department is divided into Adult, Intermediate and Primary Departments, including comment on Primary Graded Lessons. The Superintendent's Department is most practical. In addition to the lesson comment, by six specialists, it presents the most successful methods and news. The Evangel will save time and increase your efficiency.

World To-day (The)

The one magazine indispensable to every home. A world review, furnishing monthly not only a complete digest of events, but many attractive articles on timely subjects, by noted contributors. In it you will find events, religion, travel, science, invention, art, drama, literature, education, etc., treated in a popular way, affording recreation for the idle hour, and, best of all, something worth while. In illustration it is a regular panorama of the world—many of the pictures being in colors. The World To-Day is really a $3 magazine for but $1.50. It is clean, healthful and inspiring—just right for Christian readers. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain. It has proven one of our most popular publications, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

A Little Eskimo Maid

Natives of Labrador Building an Igloo or Snow House

An Eskimo Boy

AN ESKIMO HUNT IN FAR LABRADOR

By CHRISTIAN SCHMITT

Nain, Labrador

IN my last letter to you I related a walrus hunt out at sea; this time I wish briefly to sketch our Eskimo hunting in the interior. Labrador is a bleak and barren coast. We cannot call it productive, either by land or sea, and although we are scarcely able to count one Eskimo to a mile of coastline, yet the proceeds are small and only offer a meagre livelihood to its inhabitants.

It is quite correct to say that any given Eskimo procures his living more or less within a radius of from 100 to 300 miles. In summer and autumn, he hunts and fishes far out at sea the seal, the walrus, the polar bear; and when in season, the codfish claims his attention. In winter and spring he goes more inland, and during this time he is not satisfied only to follow the leads of our bays and inlets—which often reach very extensively into the interior of our peninsula—but he frequently leaves the salt water behind him, and sometimes reaches even the highest land while pursuing the deer, or hunting the wolf, black bear or fox. During some seasons, animals are plentiful, and the deer or caribou cover the hills and dales in thousands; but the seasons are not alike, and the scarcity of deer is more frequent than otherwise.

Permit me to relate to you the experiences of three of our Nain Eskimos, while thus hunting. With sleigh and dogs, rifles and ammunition and a sufficient quantity of provisions for a little over a week, they start off for caribou. The weather is fine, the snow hard—having been drifted into banks by recent gales—and the prospect on the whole promising a speedy advance into the interior. The journey leads through a bay forty miles long. The limit of the salt water is reached, and now begins a rough journey, partly through woods, here over hills, there through deep valleys, but all the time more or less ascending, until in a few days several thousand feet above sea level are reached. Here vegetation is scarce; all trees and shrubs are left behind, and only the bare rocks, with occasional patches of lichens or reindeer moss, are visible.

Here the prospects for a successful hunt are not so good. True, the distance thus far has been covered in less than four days; but now the weather is changing; a fierce snowstorm rages from the northeast, which makes traveling for the time being impossible. Our three valiant hunters—Abia Tuglavi, Josua Paniok and Efraim Ikusik—are huddled up in a small snow house, eagerly discussing the situation and planning for the future. Provisions for the dogs are all but exhausted, and, in case of a speedy retreat, it might be possible to reach Nain without actual starvation; but none of our three brave fellows think of retreat, although the future looks very gloomy. What disheartens them most is that no deer tracks have been sighted yet.

A Summer Encampment of Eskimo Hunters

Every day, every track has been carefully examined in the snow. There were tracks of foxes and partridges; also two wolf tracks were sighted and commented upon, but no deer—no, not even a sign. What made matters worse was this northeasterly gale, which brought down much soft snow and made traveling more difficult. The gale lasted three days, during which our men could not venture far from the snow house for fear of losing themselves. During this time a few partridges were killed; but all provisions had now diminished to an alarming extent. It was evident that, if no deer were sighted or killed, starvation would stare them in the face in a very few days.

What should they do? Besides themselves, there were twelve hungry dogs to feed, and nothing in sight; yea, probably no help within 200 miles. It was too late now to turn back; some food must be secured at all cost, if the men did not wish to subsist on the dogs themselves—and these were their only means of travel.

The men went to sleep that night with heavy hearts. Next morning, the weather had cleared, and it was decided that while one man trudged along slowly with the sleigh and dogs the other two should traverse the adjoining hills and valleys on snowshoes, in search of the much coveted and now sadly needed caribou. With what caution each new cavern or valley was entered! Each creek and each corner as soon as sighted was carefully examined, the hunter all the time fearing to start an unsuspecting animal. Not a sound was heard; all was still in the glaring sunshine.

Soon after midday, Efraim was overjoyed. He discovered new tracks of a huge black bear. The large paws had left a big impression on the soft, white snow, and where the snow had been piled up it was quite loose and fluffy yet—a sure sign of its recent origin, as it had not yet time to flatten down or settle. Very cautiously, Efraim followed the track, and soon found the bear behind a huge boulder of rock. When he fired his first shot out of a .40-65 Winchester, the bear was still unaware of having been detected, and the bullet passing through the head killed him instantly. Efraim was overjoyed to see the huge beast prostrate before him. He could not bear to leave his colleagues in suspense. Before touching the animal, he called them to the spot, and there these three simple Eskimos, with tears of gratitude trickling down their brown, sunburnt cheeks, thanked God for the food that had come in time to avert starvation.

Then they made a good square meal of the raw meat, and the dogs also had their share of the spoil. Soon afterward, they sighted a small herd of deer, and after killing a sufficient quantity, they returned home again.

It is my privilege again to thank you and your kind readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the gifts

A SERMON BY Rev. Llewellyn Brown*

The Three Greatest Things

TEXT—1. Cor. 13:13 (R. V.)
"And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love"

THESE significant words of the mighty apostle Paul, spoken in the long, long ago, in the days of transition from the Old Testament dispensation of law to the New Testament dispensation of love, are among the most noteworthy words that ever fell from his lips. They are widening and deepening as each successive generation reads a fuller message from their exhaustless content. The apostle in the chapter immediately preceding the one from which the text is taken had been referring to certain accompaniments of this transition period, such as tongues, interpretation of tongues, gifts of healing, the power of working miracles, and other signs. Over against these, which were coveted so much by the early church, he places the three greatest things in the world, which survive all transitions, namely, faith, hope and love. As we see men and women on every hand pressing on in the mad chase after fame, fortune and pleasure, there surely never was a time when the words of the text needed to fall with divine emphasis upon the ears of men more than to-day, when material gain is being worshiped and sacrificed to by such multitudes of devotees.

The Real Sources of Wealth

When the wealth of a nation or of an individual is computed, all too often the standard by which it is determined is purely commercial. Nations, like men, are rated according to what they are worth in dollars and cents. We are accustomed to reckon it something like this: We say of a nation that it has so much gold in its treasury, so much in mines, so much in forests and so much in agricultural lands, and these taken together constitute the national wealth. Of a man we say he has so much money in the bank, so much in real estate, so much in stocks and bonds, so much insurance on his life, aggregating thousands or millions of dollars, as the case may be. Important as these considerations surely are, we must not forget that the standard of which we have been speaking is not the highest standard to be used in computing the wealth of either nations or individuals; nay, it is not the true standard.

The fact is, we have no figures, no tabulated statements which give us the true wealth of either a nation or an individual. In all too many instances we find an attitude to regard as of but little consequence all that cannot be converted into coin. Against this prevailing tendency of our time we must strenuously guard ourselves if we would see America made enduringly great and truly rich. To study the course of some of our great captains of industry to-day one would be led to believe that all that is considered worth while to these are the material things of life, the things seen by the eye, touched with the hands, bartered on the exchange. But the soul, "that spark that disturbs our clod," as Browning puts it, cannot be fed on stocks or bonds, wheat or dividends, or money in any form. What is needed to-day, and in my judgment it is the supreme need, is a great army of men in all walks of life who will go among their fellows and preach this gospel of the higher riches, to cry out with prophetic fervor against these sordid ideals which have dethroned the true conception of life while they make material gain the shining goal of national and individual achievement. America could better afford to pour her millions into a project like this than vote them for battleships and armaments of war as is being done to-day.

Faith a Rich Asset

The point of emphasis which our forefathers gave to the national life is unquestionably being lost; and we need as a nation to return to the old paths and seek the old ways, not because they are old merely, but because they are immeasurably better. We need to emphasize the spiritual and the eternal over against the material and the temporal. We must make every loyal American feel that life consists not in things possessed, but in high thinking, in noble ideals, in exalted purposes, and that he who is rich in these can never be poor. To study the lives of the idle rich of our land one would be led to think that it was high living and low thinking that make a nation great; while we know well that it is the very opposite of this that produces national greatness, namely, plain living and high thinking.

The real wealth of a nation is not found in its mines but in its men, not in its industries but in its individuals, not in its fields but in its families, not in its sky-scrapers but in its humble homes. Tell me how rich America is in faith, in hope and in love, and I will have a better idea of the permanent greatness of this nation than I could possibly gain from columns of figures, be they never so long or never so startling. For faith is better than mines of silver and gold, hope is more to be desired than miles of forests, while love is a greater national asset than continents of fertile fields.

Faith and Belief

Taking up an expository study of the text, I ask you to notice with me three facts that lie on the very surface and yet taken together embrace the whole text, namely: first, the distinctive character of these three graces; second, their equal permanence; and third, love's supremacy.

Faith we all recognize as a great Scriptural keynote. If a thoughtful student, unfamiliar with the terminology of the Bible, were to read it through for the first time, we can imagine him saying as he lays down the book, "Well, whatever is meant by the words faith and believe must be very important, for I find these on nearly every page of this book." By faith we are taught that we are saved, to stand in the hour of temptation, to walk so as to please God, to gain the victory over the world, while Paul in one passage writes, "The life that I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me and gave himself for me." Thus we see that the ministry of faith in the life of the believer is indeed manifold, thus declaring its supreme importance. What then is faith? We are helped to apprehend the inner meaning of faith between man and God as we study faith in its daily exercise between man and man, for the faith which I exercise in the latter sphere is precisely the same in kind as that which I exercise in the former sphere. The faith with which I trust my physician or my merchant friend is not different from that I have in God and his Word.

Faith in both spheres is simply confidence based on experience, or trustworthy testimony. You tell a friend something and if he has faith in you he will believe what you say, and the greater his faith the more difficult will it be to shake his confidence in your statements. Faith in the religious sphere involves not only assent to testimony but also a veritable commital of oneself to Christ as Saviour and Lord. "He that hath received His witness," writes John, "hath set to his seal that God is true." Faith accepts that testimony, acts on it, and so finds it true.

The Inspiration of Hope

There are few lives in either the Old or New Testament that compare with Abraham's as a shining example of faith. Three prepositions of action, which is ever the test of faith, declare this unwavering faith of the patriarch as we read the story of his life. First we read that he went out, out of his native land, not knowing whither he went, but only that God was calling him out. Second we read he went up, up to Mount Moriah, the mount of sacrifice, where his dearest Isaac was laid on the altar and in spirit sacrificed. Third he went down and dwelt at Beersheba, the well of the oath. Only faith was equal to the tests God gave him. He followed the gleam and by the vision splendid was on his way attended whether it was leaving his homeland, or going up the side of the mountain to sacrifice his son; or whether it was to go back to the quiet of the country after the great test was successfully met. He went down to the well of the oath, a good place for every believer, the rest of faith, "Beersheba."

Faith, simple faith, the promise sees,
And looks to that alone;
Laughs at impossibilities,
And says, It shall be done.

Now for a word about Hope. Hope, though closely related to faith, is yet separate and distinct, both as to its nature and mission. It is of the same genus but of a different species. It is all of faith and something more. It is faith astir and longing. If faith rests on the promises of God, hope takes a different attitude and reaches forward to their fulfilment. Faith fixes her eye on the promise and is content to wait, while hope fixes her eye on the thing promised and longs for its attainment. Hope's eye is ever turned forward to the goal, to the prize, to the homeland and the beatific vision. Hope's watchword is ever

Look up, not down;
Look forward, not backward;
Look out, not in;
And lend a hand.

If faith will make us calm amid the trials of life, hope will speak to us by our sick-beds, our open caskets and our new-made graves of a life without a pain, a day without a night, a sky without a cloud, a home without a sorrow. Blessed hope! how could we live without thee? That blessed hope buoyed on the mighty suffering apostle and cheered him in the darkest night. He accomplished the great tasks he was matched to undertake because hope kept singing ever in his breast and led him triumphantly through. And what hope was to Paul it may become to any of us.

Love, Queen of the Graces

And now for a word about the queen of all the graces, Love. This is the greatest because it is the mother grace. It begets both faith and hope. Only on love's soil will these two graces just referred to thrive. Love is the root while faith and hope are the fruit. Love in its very nature is quite distinct from either faith or hope.

Paul in his panegyric on love draws a sharp distinction between mere almsgiving, bigheartedness, careless toleration and this grace of love that he urged the Corinthians to covet. A man according to Paul's doctrine in this chapter might be philanthropic, big-hearted and tolerant and yet not have this grace of love here spoken of. He may be a liberal contributor to public charities, endowing colleges, building libraries, founding hospitals, bettering the physical and social conditions of many of his fellow-men; yea, he might be even a martyr, offering his very body in devotion to his cause, and yet not have the love which the apostle here refers to.

This love is something more than any of these things referred to. It is love divine, all love excelling. It is love begotten in our hearts by the Spirit of God. It is not a natural quality, but rather a spiritual grace. It is the fruit of regeneration and is unknown to the heart of the natural man. Only he who loves God supremely can love as this chapter speaks of. Great as faith surely is, and important as is hope, both have to yield allegiance to love. For while these three abide, the greatest is love.

Notice the equal permanence of the three graces:

And now abideth faith, hope, love.

Different in quality and ministration as they surely are, each in turn is nevertheless abiding. They go on forever while other gifts come and go. There are some who think that faith and hope will be unknown graces in heaven. This sentiment is often expressed in our hymns. Faith we are told will be lost in sight and hope will end in its fruition. Love of course is to abide. Scriptural proof for this theory will have to be found outside of this text, for of all three it is stated that they will "abide." We must admit that there are some aspects of faith that will vanish. The pilgrim and warrior faith, for example, will be unknown in heaven, for the simple reason that the journey will be over and the battle will be won.

Foregleams of the Future Life

The sandals will be unloosed and the sword forever laid aside. The walk of faith and the fight of faith will be no more. But these familiar conceptions do not exhaust faith. There is a more transcendent faith than this. Faith we can well imagine will ever abide and will bridge the chasm between the Creator and the creature. Waking up in Christ's own likeness we shall surely be satisfied; nearer and still nearer will we ever come to Christ, more like and ever more like him will we become as the ages roll, and yet between us and him

TRAPPED IN A BURNING MINE

THE TERRIBLE DISASTER AT CHERRY, ILL.—OVER 200 MINERS PROBABLY THE VICTIMS

CHERRY, Ill., is a small mining village, some seven miles north of Spring Valley Station, on a branch of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway. It has a population of about 3,000, practically all miners, most of them being Austrians and Italians. On Saturday, November 13, Cherry was the scene of one of the worst coal mine disasters recorded in recent years. Shortly after noon on that day, when there were over four hundred men working in the different veins of the St. Paul coal mine, a careless miner flung a torch upon a bundle of hay, which was kept for mule feed. It blazed up in an instant. The men tried to put it out, and, failing in this, flung the burning mass on a cart, where it blazed up worse than before. Then they fled for the main shaft, 250 feet away.

There was an almost instant panic in the mine. All the men in the different veins, or passageways, joined in a wild scramble for the main shaft. Hundreds of the workers found themselves caught in a trap. The dry timbers took fire, and the smoke and flames quickly shut off the only path of escape.

In the first rush, some twenty-five soon succeeded in reaching a point of safety. These were soon followed by others, until 170 were rescued. Then came an explosion of gas, which shook the entire mine, and was distinctly felt by those above ground. By three o'clock the fire had spread to other parts of the mine, and soon jets of flame and dense clouds of smoke began to come out of the shaft's mouth, which had been surrounded by panic-stricken crowds.

Frenzied efforts were now made to reach the imprisoned miners, and the cage which had carried them to their work was kept busily ascending and descending for several hours after the explosion. The first rescue trip brought up a score of the miners, who had escaped with light bruises. Trip after trip was made, and many came up almost exhausted. Heroic hands had placed the worst victims in the cage. The last trip brought up the mine superintendent and his assistants—all dead! Life was extinct when the surface was reached. The men had literally roasted alive in the cage. There were many splendid instances of bravery while the fire was eating its way along the corridors of the mine. Dr. L. D. Howe, the mining company's physician, was one of the heroes. He went down in the cage eight times, with others, and personally saved twenty-five men, dragging them to the shaft. His own hands and face were badly burned, but he came out alive. No man seemed to think of himself in those terrible hours of suffering and peril. Comrade saved comrade, taking his own chances of living or dying. John McGill, a sturdy miner, strapped his son to his back, and, on hands and knees, crawled to the shaft. Both were rescued almost by a miracle.

For five hours after the explosion the efforts at rescue were kept up, until further work was impossible owing to the dense smoke and flames, which were now eating away the timbers of the shaft itself. Over 300 were still left in the mine, and it was believed the imprisoned men had retreated to the third vein, nearly 500 feet from the main shaft, in the hope of finding a sufficiency of oxygen to maintain life.

In the hope of checking the fire, it was decided to seal the entrance to the mine, and this was accordingly done by heaping planks and sacking and other material across the entrance until all air was excluded. Meanwhile, great crowds had assembled about the mouth of the shaft, many of them the wives and children of the imprisoned miners. Their outcries and their tears would have moved the stoutest heart. They clung despairingly to the faint hope that the men below might have reached some remote point, where they might yet be rescued after the fire was burnt out.

General View of Cherry, Looking from the Shelf

Next morning (Sunday), when the flames had apparently subsided, the shaft was uncovered and three futile attempts were made to enter and explore the mine. Experts in oxygen helmets descended to the second vein, where they encountered obstructions, and were compelled to return. Everything below was silent as the tomb. That was the saddest Sunday ever known in Cherry. At the pit mouth were gathered thousands of the population, and it seemed as though the wives and children had been there all the long night. The distress of the women was pitiful. Every successive failure to reach the imprisoned men drew forth loud lamentations and protests from the crowd. It was soon discovered that the fire was still raging, and it was decided once more to seal the mine.

For thirty hours the shaft's mouth was covered, and when the bags and planking were again removed, on Monday, a rescue party went down in the cage. With the rescuers were R. I. Williams, of Columbia University, and State Mine Inspector Thomas Moses. They reached the second level without difficulty. Another party went down shortly afterward. There was no sign of life, and no dead visible, which seemed to confirm the belief that the miners had retreated to some distant point. This news revived hope, and a third rescue trip was descending when it was checked by the flames, which had been rekindled by the draft from the open shaft. Hose was lowered, but there was no water supply.

On Tuesday, November 16, the underground fires were still raging and the mine was unapproachable to the rescuers. Hope of ultimately saving the unfortunate workers was now practically abandoned. With a temperature of 110 degrees all day, it was considered impossible that any of the imprisoned 300 could survive. The chief of the Chicago Fire Department came to Cherry, with his staff and fire apparatus, and 200,000 gallons of water, brought in tank cars on the railroad, were poured into the mine, but seemingly had no effect on the underground conflagration.

So convinced were the mining officials that all below had perished that arrangements were made to use two large tool-houses as temporary morgues, and 300 pine coffins were ordered. As fears were entertained of a violent outbreak, owing to the intense excitement in Cherry and the bitter feeling over the closing of the mine, two companies of State troops were despatched to the little mining town to preserve order. All the saloons were closed as a precautionary measure.

There are over a thousand orphans in Cherry to-day. In one row of thirty miners' cabins there is not a single home that is not the scene of sorrow and mourning for a missing husband, father or son. Great suffering must ensue among the destitute women and children, who have lost their bread-winners. Dr. Howe has already begun relief work among them.

On Saturday, November 20, seven days after the accident, it was found that a number of the miners were still alive. Twenty-two were brought to the surface, and it was hoped to save others. Ninety-two dead bodies were also recovered, leaving 198 still missing. The rescued men told a terrible story of suffering. After their food gave out they ate bark, their leather belts and gloves, and even their lampwicks. Several wrote in the dark farewell letters to their wives. William Cleland, a pious miner, was their religious mainstay, and kept alive their trust in God. When found by the rescuers the imprisoned miners were singing the hymn, "Abide with me," and were apparently resigned to die.

THE THREE GREATEST THINGS

Sermon by Rev. Llewellyn Brown

in even our most advanced stage of spiritual development there will ever be room for the exercise of faith, for he will be the central flaming Sun and we but tapers lit by his light. He will be God over all, blessed forever, and we will be the sons of God. Yonder enthroned he will sit measureless in might, infinite in all his attributes, perfect in holiness, the Mighty God, the Ancient of Days. There as here he will be adored as Saviour, as Mediator, as Revealer. Ever we can well imagine the wondering cry of the redeemed will be

> And could it be that I should claim
> An interest in my Saviour's blood?

The song that will keep heaven warm will be the song of the Lamb, that song that only the blood-washed throng can learn. No angel can lisp it, no seraph can join in it. Only those who know the power of the blood to wash out the defilements of sin and to renew the fallen nature can ever hope to sing that song that will never die.

No faith in heaven? True, if there be no mystery there. No faith in heaven? True, if there be no knowledge to be gained. No faith in heaven? True, if we be equal with God. We can well imagine that there will be room for faith in heaven, making ever the relation between Creator and creature vital. The Lamb will be the light of that city. Faith will engage the soul in wondering contemplation of his matchless beauty.

> Millions of years our wondering eyes
> Shall o'er our Saviour's beauties rove.

Some tell us that hope will accompany the believer unto death, yea, even to the pearly gate, but beyond that it cannot go. But, Hope, we would fain bring thee in too! No hope in heaven? True, if there is nothing in store for the soul beyond its perfection at death. True, if there is no further progress to be made. True, if there is no fresh glory to be revealed. True, if heaven is a dull, monotonous plain, with no change, no variety, no development from glory unto glory and from grace to grace.

Lastly, Love's supremacy. "The greatest of these is love." Why is love supreme? Because it is the most God-like of all the Christian graces. We do not read that God is faith or hope, but we do read "God is Love." Faith and hope alike have a selfish aspect in that both have their hands extended to get something, while love is purely unselfish, having her hands extended to give something. Faith teaches us to rest in the Lord, hope to wait patiently for him, while Love sets us to work for him. Mighty trinity of graces, come into our lives with thy blessed ministries and so sweeten time and brighten eternity. God save us from the faithless, hopeless and loveless life! If these three graces are the three greatest things in the world, then let us make our lives rich in them; and then we know that no call of God or our brother man shall go unanswered, and we shall learn the inner meaning of the refrain of the poet:

> For to give is to live,
> And to deny is to die.

HE WAS THE OUTCASTS' FRIEND

AT the ripe age of seventy-six years, and with a record of over a quarter of a century of unique Christian philanthropy unequaled by that of any other American of his time, Charles N. Crittenton, founder of the famous Crittenton Homes for friendless and outcast girls, passed away in San Francisco on Tuesday, November 16, after a short illness. He had arrived in that city ten days before, and was suffering from a bad cold. Pneumonia set in and he rapidly became worse. His weakness and lowered vitality gave little hope, and, after a few days of struggle, the end was reached.

The story of Mr. Crittenton's life reads like a romance. For twenty years he was a successful business man in New York, and was president of the Charles N. Crittenton Company, wholesale druggists, of No. 115 Fulton Street. On March 16, 1882, his daughter Florence, five years old, died, and he began his rescue mission work as a monument to her memory. No child has ever had such a monument erected in her honor as that which was reared to perpetuate the name of this much-loved girl.

The world now seemed empty to Mr. Crittenton, and the riches he had toiled for so untiringly were like a mockery to him when she no longer lived to inherit them. The dark cloud of his sorrow lay heavily upon him until he was induced by a Christian friend, who was conducting a mission in lower New York, to help the latter in his labor. Then, for the first time, the cloud lifted, and he saw that it had a silver lining.

By that sweet, mysterious law of our being, the pent-up love of the heart which bereavement has sealed breaks forth anew in ministering to others. We often cannot love those who do us service, but no one can do a kindness to another without a feeling of love to the one whom he has helped. Mr. Crittenton did not feel so desolate when he was trying to comfort others in their sorrow and telling them of the love of Christ. He continued his efforts, and one night, when pleading with an abandoned woman to forsake her depraved life and sin no more, he received the impetus which was to inspire all his future.

The woman asked the natural question how she was to live if she turned from evil, all avenues to her return to decent living being closed to her. In trying to find a practical answer to her question Mr. Crittenton discovered how difficult it was for such women to return to virtuous life. The gulf seemed impassable, and, while it remained so, it was a mockery to urge them to repent. He satisfied himself that with a compassionate heart and a liberal expenditure of money an opportunity for reclamation might be afforded that many would embrace. He resolved to make the experiment. He hired a large house in a suitable quarter in New York, had it cleansed and furnished, and caused it to be known that any woman of vicious life desiring to reform would be cordially welcomed there, and would be helped to cut loose from evil associations and be assisted in her efforts to recover her lost position in society. It was a pleasure to him to identify this effort with his lost daughter. He gave the house her name, and the first Florence Mission was established.

It succeeded beyond his hopes. Some of the rescued girls were restored to their homes, some were enabled to secure employment, and some were married. Mr. Crittenton's success in New York encouraged him to establish similar institutions in other cities, and there are now many of them in various parts of the country, shining like beacons to those who have made moral shipwreck of life. In some instances the missions have been placed under the care of women who have themselves been rescued from lives of shame; and it has been found that none are more successful than they in the work of rescuing others. So the name of the lost child has been immortalized and her memory is perpetuated in the hearts of many who through these memorials of her have been saved from ruin.

After founding the Florence Night Mission at No. 21 Bleecker Street, New York, Mr. Crittenton gave up all other business and decided to devote his whole life to the new work which had providentially opened before him. He controlled a large income, which he expended wholly upon the mission work he had carefully planned. Consecrating his entire energies to this task, he took upon himself the labors of a missionary and evangelist, and went from city to city, establishing new Homes at points where social conditions were the worst. More than seventy-four Florence Crittenton Homes were thus founded, and thousands of young women were rescued from lives of sin and shame. Not only was each of these Homes a refuge and an open door for the poor social outcasts, but it held out to them the hope and solace of the Gospel. Many found peace and blessing in believing and date their new life from the time they entered the Florence Crittenton Homes.

Mr. Crittenton, in the course of his evangelistic work, traveled in other lands, with the result that, observing social conditions in many foreign cities, he founded Homes in these also wherever the opportunity was afforded and the need seemed to demand it. Shanghai, Tokyo, City of Mexico, Marseilles, and populous cities in other foreign lands have similar Homes founded in memory of the little American girl who with her dying breath pleaded with her father to "help other girls." That loving, last request was surely a rich legacy in its world-wide results. Thousands of rescued and redeemed women to-day live to bless the memory of this gentle child, and to sorrow for the loss of the kind, tender, noble man who had been the best friend they had ever known on earth.

Mr. Crittenton was born at Henderson, Jefferson County, N. Y., February 20, 1833. He was an ardent advocate of temperance, and was at one time Prohibition candidate for Mayor of New York. He did not seek the nomination and never cared for politics. His wife was Josephine Slosson, of Lawrenceville, Pa. They had three children, Charles N. Crittenton, Adeline E. Crittenton and Florence J. Crittenton, all of whom died many years ago.

INVESTIGATING THE SUGAR COMBINE

ONE of the most important investigations in recent American history has been commenced by two branches of the government at Washington—the Attorney-General's Department and the Treasury Department—and Congress itself may take a hand in the near future if it feels that the situation is such that the representatives of the people must take it up. Grave charges have been made involving the American Sugar Refining Company, popularly known as the Sugar Trust, in which almost all of the companies who are doing a successful sugar business have been combined. At least those independent refiners still in the field have had and are having a hard row to hoe and are practically a negligible quantity so far as cutting any great figure in the commercial world goes.

The acts of the Sugar Trust have been under scrutiny for some time past, and some of its officials indicted, but recently discoveries have been made which have caused the government to think that there has been collusion between the combine and some of the government officers and employees. It is alleged that the sugar has been under-weighed for years, especially at the New York docks, and there has been a loss to the government of an enormous amount in duties.

It is alleged that the American Sugar Refining Company has evaded payment of from about five to nine per cent. of the duty on every cargo of sugar brought in, and that the amount it saved for itself in this way—money which belonged legally to the United States Government—foots up to the tremendous sum of thirty millions of dollars.

It is charged that these acts have been committed during a period extending over the last twenty years. It is said the shippers knew about it, but dared not protest too vigorously for fear of losing the sugar transportation trade and having their business hampered in case they incurred the enmity of the combine. It is alleged also that a large number of the weighers, who are under civil service rules, knew about it, as did some of the higher officials in the customs service. The government, as is often the case with victims, was the last one to find out what has been going on.

Most of the alleged frauds were committed in connection with cargoes taken through the New York Custom House. Other custom houses may not be greatly affected by the investigation, as very little sugar has in recent years been brought to any other port than New York. A short time ago, before many of the facts now known had come to light, the combine was prosecuted for weighing short of the actual amount of the cargoes and was convicted and fined $135,000. This was last April. The combine paid the fine, glad evidently to escape so easily and little dreaming of the storm which had been gathering for some time and which was almost ready to burst upon them. It also paid in the sum of two million dollars as restitution for losses sustained by the government.

The case against the company for weighing frauds was inaugurated a year ago, after many complaints had been made to the customs authorities by ship owners and others. The ship captains knew that when they set sail they had a certain number of pounds of sugar. When it was weighed at New York, five per cent. or more had apparently vanished. Evaporation could only account for a small fraction of this. The ship owners had to make good this difference.

Sugar imported through the custom houses at New York and Philadelphia for independent refining companies showed practically no diminution in weight after a voyage as long as that brought to New York. Most of the independents still in the field are refining domestic sugar or sugar brought from Hawaii.

The information which led to the present great storm of public protest against the alleged acts of the corporation was secured by a former employee of the company and also by a very active and efficient employee of the Treasury Department, Mr. Richard Parr.

The public or private investigators have never been allowed to see the records in the custom house or the various discrepancies might have been apparent. It is said that the allegations can be proved from the records on file there, which show on the same sheet the actual amount of a cargo and also the amount on which duty was paid.

Employees who protested, it is said, were either "frozen out" of the service or made to understand that if they did not keep quiet they would lose their jobs. It would appear that in a number of cases where government employees had to leave for violations, or because their acts were too obvious and brought the system under suspicion, they were at once hired by the trust.

It is also alleged that money was lost to the government by sugar not being appraised at its full value and by the doctoring of sugar samples.

Such in brief are the startling charges made, to which many facts give the color of probable truth. The government at last feels that they should be thoroughly sifted.

PRESIDENT TAFT PRAISES MISSIONS

MANY ELOQUENT ADDRESSES AT THE LAYMEN'S MISSIONARY CONVENTION IN WASHINGTON

GREAT attendance, the enthusiasm displayed and the tangible results attained at the Missionary Convention recently held in Washington augur well for the country-wide success of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. It was appropriate that this national crusade should be started at the American capital, and wide influence has been exerted by the circumstance that a number of the leading officials of the nation took an active part in the four-day campaign at the seat of government. Finally, significance was given to the gathering by the fact that President Taft so arranged his recent transcontinental journey as to enable him to be back in Washington to deliver the principal address at the opening session.

The Washington meeting sounded the keynote of the winter campaign of 1909-10 in behalf of the extension of foreign missions. The gathering was not the first of its kind, for conventions, and creditable ones, too, had previously been held in Buffalo, Bristol, Tenn.; Cleveland; Richmond, Va., and Worcester, Mass. However, the Washington convention, which was held in the new half million dollar National Home of the Daughters of the American Revolution, was introductory to the carefully mapped campaign of the current winter and the coming spring.

It was a young Washingtonian, Mr. John B. Sleman, a business man of the national capital, who originated this whole movement, which now embraces the United States, Great Britain, Canada, Australia and the Y. M. C. A. throughout the world. He conceived the idea while attending a convention held at Nashville, for the purpose of recruiting young men for the missionary field. For months he turned the new project over in his mind, and finally outlined it publicly at a meeting held at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City, in November, 1906. Then and there the Laymen's Missionary Movement became a reality; but it was some time later ere there was instituted that Committee of One Hundred, in whose hands rests the direction of the great crusade.

Mr. Gifford Pinchot, the Forester of the United States, is chairman of the General Committee and presided at the opening session of the Washington convention. He introduced President Taft as the author of "the best statement ever issued on the missionary question." Mr. Pinchot referred, of course, to an extract from President Taft's well-known speech on "Missions and Civilization," which the General Committee of the Laymen's Missionary Movement has adopted as its motto. In this now historic pronouncement President Taft said, in substance, that in the spread of Christianity lies the only basis for hope of modern civilization and the growth of popular self-government.

The President endorsed and amplified his earlier remarks in the inspiring speech at the Washington convention just held. He cited the Philippine Islands as an example of what foreign missions can do. He declared that the beneficent movement which has been going on in the Chinese empire found its inspiration in the foreign missionaries, adding: "The development of China to-day is largely the result of, first, the missionary movement, and second, the education in America and elsewhere, under the influence of these missionaries, of young Chinamen who are anxious that their country shall take the position that her wealth, numbers, resources, possibilities and history justify. The same thing is true in regard to Africa." He gave unstinted praise to the missionaries in all quarters of the globe, referring to them as keepers of the "outposts of civilization," and in conclusion said: "I sincerely hope that the result of this movement will give to the foreign missions an impetus which the cause cannot have unless the whole body of good men in the community press forward."

A unique feature of the opening session was the presence in one of the boxes overlooking the platform of two Englishwomen. Women have all along manifested much interest in the laymen's movement, but as the crusade was organized because it was felt that the women of the country were doing more than their share of the missionary work of the churches the stand has been taken that all available seats at the gatherings should be reserved for men. Indeed, at the convention at Washington the attendance at almost every session overtaxed the capacity of the auditorium. However, when the British Ambassador, Hon. James Bryce, in ignorance of these arrangements, appeared at Continental Hall with two of the ladies of his household an exception was made to the existing rule.

"The Evangelization of the World in This Generation" was the slogan which was developed and adopted during the convention at the capital. "Asia must be taken and we must advance at once" was the summons sounded by one of the most forceful speakers, and immediately accepted as the keynote of the movement. That such conventions as that in Washington are productive of immediate practical results was eloquently attested by the fact that, as a result of the agitation, the yearly contribution of the churches of the capital to foreign missions was increased from $62,000 to more than $100,000. Early in the convention it was determined to work for the $100,000 goal. Some denominations pledged themselves to double in 1910 their contributions of 1909, and when, at the final session of the convention, stock was taken of these various pledges it was found that the sum of $113,000 was assured!

The success of the Washington convention and of all such gatherings in increasing missionary offerings is undoubtedly due to forceful presentation of the needs of the cause. Mr. J. Campbell White, of New York, called attention, for instance, to the fact that, whereas this country exports $150,000,000 worth of merchandise every month, it requires one year for it to export $10,000,000 for missions. Again, in the course of an address, he said: "If the churches of America can be led to increase their gifts to missionary work abroad, until they equal about one-fourth of the amount now expended for religious purposes in this country, we can probably make the message of Christ known to 600,000,000 non-Christians before the middle of this century. Money is not the only condition of evangelizing the world, but it is an essential condition. Just now, it is the point of greatest weakness. Workers are offering to go faster than the money has been available to send them. Missionary leaders of all fields believe that it is now possible to evangelize the whole world in our generation. We do not mean by this that every one will become a Christian, but that an adequate opportunity to become a Christian can be afforded to every person."

Mr. White pointed out that America's share of the non-Christian world is about 600,000,000; that is, there are approximately that number of people in the fields now occupied by American missionaries. However, according to his computation, fully 450,000,000 of these people, or more than two-thirds of the total, are beyond the reach of our present missionary force. Under the present status each American missionary has a parish of fully 100,000 souls, whereas there should be an allowance of at least four missionaries to each community of that size. In other words, it was Mr. White's idea that if the American churches can quadruple their missionary forces in the foreign field there will be an excellent chance of winning a decisive victory, provided the increased number of missionaries are given the necessary equipment for their task.

"The two things needed," he said in conclusion, "are intelligence and business method. The city of Toronto has increased its missionary offerings from $120,000 to $400,000 within little more than a year by the laymen of all churches taking hold as advocates and organizers. The Southern Presbyterian Church has increased its missionary offering in three years from $223,000 to $412,000 per year. We spend over $250,000,000 a year for religious purposes in this country. One-fourth, or perhaps even one-fifth of such an amount, would support an adequate force of missionaries; but instead of giving $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 a year for foreign missions we give less than $10,000,000, or less than four per cent. of what we spend for Christian work at home."

An interesting figure in the convention was Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, the famous missionary of the Labrador coast. He made an address in which he spoke eloquently of the need of more extensive missionary work. Other practical workers who aided by the recitation of personal experience and practical demonstration of possibilities included George Sherwood Eddy of India, Rev. S. M. Zwemer of Arabia, Rev. F. L. H. Pott, president of St. John's College, Shanghai; Rev. A. P. Parker, president of the Anglo-Chinese College at Shanghai, and others.

At the concluding session of the convention resolutions were adopted calling for increased activities in behalf of missionary work, and earnestly recommending the appointment in every congregation of a strong missionary committee, to conduct a campaign of education on the subject of missions.

A Friend in Need Is a Friend Indeed

WHEN trouble comes upon you unawares the friend that will help you to handle it is the very friend you want. Before the Doctor Comes is just such a friend. No matter what may befall you or your dear ones in the way of accident or illness this Compendium of Medical Advice counsels you as to what should be done to render most effective service pending the arrival of a physician. Croup, diphtheria, heart trouble, strangulated hernia, accidents, and dozens of other unexpected, but by no means unusual visitations are handled in the simple language of every-day life; and the most efficacious, up-to-date emergency treatment is plainly indicated.

To have such a volume in the house affords a sense of security and confidence that will prove valuable when an emergency arises. If ever a book was made to be helpful to a family in time of distress this is the book.

BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES contains nearly 400 pages with numerous illustrations, and is bound in green silk cloth and gold. This indispensable volume delivered free, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one whole year, and our great "Dreamland" Calendar (and if you are in time, also the superb photogravure DAUGHTERS OF DORCAS), all for only TWO DOLLARS.

Human Life Held Too Cheap

IT is worse than useless now to moralize over the terrible mining holocaust at Cherry, Ill., where over three hundred poor miners met death by flame and smoke underground. What is needed now is to make that disaster a turning point to bring about such reforms in mining management as will go far toward making such horrors impossible. We are told that the mine had all the latest appliances; but, if so, they failed dismally at the very moment when most wanted. If that life-saving equipment had been available; if the electric lights had not been out of commission, but had been there for the men to use, instead of the naked torch (which was an invitation to conflagration), and, finally, if an ample water supply had been provided for just such a sudden emergency, the story would have been far less of a tragedy and there would not have been a village full of weeping widows and orphans. Human life is held too cheaply in our mines. The humble heroes of Cherry, many of whom saved their comrades at the cost of their own lives, will not have died in vain if their sudden taking off should arouse the country to the need of such reforms as will afford the greatest protection to miners in the future.

"Whosoever"

THE world has been made infinitely richer by the Christ-like life of such a man as Charles N. Crittenton. Consecrating his great wealth and himself for over a quarter of a century to a work from which many even of our grandest philanthropists have shrunk, he accomplished results that would have been impossible except to one sustained at every step by divine blessing and direction. His active brain and generous heart, receiving inspiration from a child, planned a chain of refuges extending around the world, for the most despised of all classes. Seventy-four missions for the rescue of the outcast, whom society usually spurns and condemns, exist to attest the tremendous earnestness and the triumphant energy of this wonderful man. He was, in the largest sense, the "friend of the unfortunate." Neither George Muller nor Dr. Cullis, world-wide as is the fame of their philanthropies, ever planned so grandly or built so well as he. He was his own pioneer and evangelist, going out into the highways and byways and giving to the poor victims of misfortune and sin the invitation to a better life. His call was to "whosoever will," and those who accepted it, no matter to what depths they might have fallen, were surprised to find themselves treated with a gentleness and a consideration that were in strange contrast with their familiar surroundings. He was the highest modern type of the "good Samaritan." Nor was his task of mercy complete until he had led those he had rescued to that Saviour whom he delighted to serve.

A Call for "Housecleaning"

MANY of the charges against various trusts made during the past few years were on a somewhat scanty foundation, and have been made in part to serve political purposes. Having heard the cry of "wolf" so often, a great many people who have the welfare of the country at heart did not get unduly excited when quite grave charges were made against the Sugar Trust. As the evidence grew stronger they aroused themselves, and when it was seen that it was probable that men paid to protect the government's interest might be the tools of a company which had an object in eluding full payments of government duties there was a demand for instant action, a thorough official housecleaning, and, if need be, severe punishments for the company and the accused officials if proved guilty of the charges made. The facts in regard to the operations of the Sugar Trust and certain custom house employees, made public a few days ago, call for the most searching examination of the facts and also radical reform in the public service.

Both the Attorney-General's office and the Treasury Department are now actively investigating, and the public has hopes that now something will be done to sift the matter to the bottom, cost what it may and regardless of whomever it may implicate. The very honor of the government itself will be involved if, on an examination, matters are as bad as reports would indicate. Congress may take action and additional laws be passed to cover such cases in the future if the present ones are found to be inadequate. It would seem, however, from the facts in hand that new legislation is not needed, but a thorough overhauling of the large custom houses and their way of doing business, and an extensive "shake-up" in the corps of officials wherever they cannot be considered as above suspicion. The combine, if guilty, should be punished, and so severely punished that it will not be considered safe by any other importing company to follow in its footsteps.

Above all else, the exposure teaches the old lesson that sooner or later wrongdoing is found out, even though for a time the briber and the bribetaker may apparently prosper. There is always exposure and punishment at the end of the road.

The Cost of Living

THE cost of foodstuffs, and especially the cost of meat, is alarming to people of limited means. The housekeeper who depends chiefly on meat to feed her family will find a depleted pocketbook at the end of the week. There is more than a probability that most Americans eat too much meat. Physicians are constantly warning patients against making red meat a prominent article of diet. They say, with truth, that it accounts for no little rheumatism and neuritis. Other foods are quite as nutritious. Fruit, vegetables, cereals, milk, eggs and nuts are good articles for the table. The French, with their pot-au-feu, into which bones, bits of vegetables, beans, peas and savory herbs are dropped, have a secret of economy and wholesome living which we might well imitate. In the ordinary American family there is usually much waste, and the cost of living might be reduced for many of us, even in a season of high prices, by attention to small economies. We may expect to see very soon, in a number of States, such legislation as will effectually prevent the exploitation of the necessaries of life, leading to any exorbitant rise in prices, such as we are now witnessing. Such advances are only justified in seasons of actual scarcity. It should be made impossible to tax the general consumer beyond the reasonable profits of legitimate business, and this can only be attained by the enactment of the necessary laws making every attempt to force up prices unduly a punishable offense.

Christ and Wealth

A READER asks us to define the attitude of Jesus regarding money. His whole life, his labors and his words supply the definition in abundant measure. He came to earth as a child of poverty, "that he might not be marked out by rank or fortune among the children of men. He came in such guise to prove that the poorest baby is just as dear to the Father above as any little prince born in the purple of a palace." In his whole ministry the riches or poverty of those among whom he labored made no difference in his sight; yet he made it very clear that those whose chief employment was the accumulation of riches would find it hard to become his followers. Many times he spoke of wealth, but always in words of warning lest its possession should harden the heart and render the sympathies obtuse. He emphasized the fact that our possessions are a stewardship and a part of our moral and spiritual discipline. To be faithful in this trust was one of the severest tests of character. For the mere money-getter, who stored up riches through avarice, or for the sake of gratifying indulgence, he had nothing but denunciation; but he duly recognized the beneficence of wealth in the hands of those who rightly held it as in trust, to be used for the glory of God and the good of humanity. Thus the righteous holder of wealth, by sanctifying its possession, may become a blessing to society and an honor to the race. The selfish, the covetous, the parsimonious, the mercenary, the profligate, the mammon-worshiper, were each objects of divine censure; while the just, the open-handed and generous-hearted, who had no dread of diminishing their store whenever duty or sympathy called, who remembered the poor, the sick and the afflicted, and delighted in searching out new ways of helpfulness, were "lending to the Lord" and would not be without reward.

A Timely Warning

WHILE THE CHRISTIAN HERALD always makes very generous provision for its premium requirements, it not infrequently happens that, owing to the unusual demand for some one premium, this particular supply is exhausted before all Holiday orders can be filled, and to provide another edition in time for these requirements is simply a mechanical impossibility. Then, of course, disappointment results.

Therefore, if you see a premium you really desire, do not delay, but send your order at once, and, if you are too late, we will wire you to that effect at our expense and immediately refund by mail your full remittance.

Then why take chances when prompt action will secure for you the very book you want or immediate refund of your remittance? A single day's delay may make you just one day late. Then why risk it? Send to-day and make sure of getting it. We want to serve you to your satisfaction, but we cannot do impossibilities.

This year is a prosperous year. Renewal subscriptions are pouring from every quarter. Therefore send your order in now and avoid disappointment.

Special Notice

We inadvertently omitted from our last week's issue the advertisement of The Modern Priscilla. The Modern Priscilla has been published for more than twenty years, and is a National authority on all kinds of Art Needle Work, Arts and Crafts, and Home Decoration. It is published monthly, and as it comes into your home twelve times during the year it offers many suggestions for beautifying not only your own home, but the homes of your friends.

In renewing your subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether you take or do not take premiums, whether you do or do not take a Magazine combination, you may obtain a full year's subscription to The Modern Priscilla, a Fancy Work Magazine, by adding only 50 cents to your remittance for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A year's subscription to The Modern Priscilla will also make an attractive Christmas gift for a loved one, and would remind her of you twelve times during the year. See advertisement on page 1031.

Grecian Masterpiece Discovered

THIRTY years ago a fierce storm broke down a piece of the sea-wall of Antium in Italy, disclosing one of the most beautiful masterpieces of Grecian art. It was removed to the palace grounds of Prince Aldobrandini, and preserved by him until the other day, when he sold it to the Italian government for $90,000, and it was conveyed to the National Museum at Rome. Its name is the Girl of Anzio, and it bears every evidence of having been the handiwork of Praxiteles himself. It is a life-size figure of a girl dressed in a woolen garment, one end pulled over the left shoulder, leaving the right shoulder bare; magnificent in its drapery as to the texture and folds, and bound around the waist by a girdle. The features are purely Hellenic; her eyes are looking down intently at a spray of laurel, a linen band, and two claws of a feline animal on a tray, which she holds in her hand.

Interpreters claim that the figure represents a priestess of Study on her way to pay her devotions and make her offerings to the deity. On December 11, 1878, a fisherman, caught in the heavy storm, steered for Anzio, the ancient Antium. Approaching the sea-wall, he discovered that a piece of it had been broken down by the storm, and in the dim dawn he saw a beautiful female figure of pure white marble. Suspecting its value, he tried to make way with it, but was unsuccessful, and Prince Aldobrandini, on whose property it stood, learning of its discovery, had it removed to his palace, where he kept it in comparative concealment until two years ago, when Mrs. John Gardner, of Boston, offered him $120,000 for it. He accepted the offer, and was about to ship it to this country, when the Italian government forbade its exportation, and recently gave him two-thirds of the amount which Mrs. Gardner had offered and removed it to Rome. Unlike all the other statues which have been found at Anzio, the Apollo Belvidere and others of less celebrity, the Girl of Anzio had not been uncovered by man, but had come to light after twenty centuries of darkness by the hand of the storm. There is added significance to this figure from the fact that it stood in the ground of the summer palace of the Emperor Nero at Antium, and that the Girl of Anzio which surprised the fisherman that early morning was the same one which Nero and his courtiers beheld with admiration from his palace, and it preserved its beauty untouched and unchanged through all the centuries.

Roman arms conquered Greece, Grecian letters and art mastered Rome. The Roman Emperor had to go to the Grecian sculptor to adorn his palace grounds. Paul on Mars Hill was in the midst of the statues chiseled by Grecian artists. The Girl of Anzio in the National Museum at Rome, representing the priestess of Study, expresses the self-same thought as the one mentioned by Luke in his description of Paul among the statues of the Acropolis when, referring to the Grecians, he says:

For all the Athenians and strangers which were there spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or hear some new thing. (Acts 17 : 21.)

A Radium Institute

Prominent scientists the other day organized the Radium Institute of America, which is to be devoted to the treatment of disease by radium, under benevolent auspices. Their plan includes the establishment of a clinic and a laboratory for the study of this remedial agent. It is believed that radium will aid materially in curing diseases, including cancer. The following officers were elected: Dr. Charles F. Chandler, of Columbia University, president; Dr. Robert Abbey, a radium specialist, vice-president; Professor William Halleck, of Columbia University, secretary; Dr. Pegram, of Columbia, assistant secretary; Dr. Hugo Lieber, celebrated chemist, treasurer. This institute will explore the sources of radium and of radio-active minerals. Waters which have radio-active properties will be examined, such as those of Saratoga and Blue Lick Springs. It is expected that a clinic will be attached to one of the hospitals, and that its laboratory will be installed at Columbia University. What a blessing it would be if these men would discover a remedy for cancer, which has been counted incurable! There is no disease that afflicts the soul that cannot be cured by the touch of Christ. It is a great pity that any should fail to go to the Great Physician for health.

Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered? (Jer. 9 : 22.)

Trades Unions and Saloons

One of the most important phases of the great temperance revolution in this country is the relation of organized labor to the saloons. In many places the liquor dealers had cultivated the labor organizations, so that many of them held their weekly meetings on Sunday, and held them either in the back room of a saloon or in some room or hall over it. Fortunately, many of the labor leaders, knowing what an enemy the saloon is to the workingman, and every other man in fact, are using their efforts, not without success, to divorce the trades unions and their meetings from the influence and domination of the saloons. A fierce conflict was waged between the friends and enemies of the liquor traffic at the convention of the American Federation of Labor, in Toronto, the other day. The temperance people held a mass meeting, at which four thousand persons were present, and addresses were made by Rev. Charles Stelzle, John Mitchell, John B. Lennon, Thomas L. Lewis and James Simpson, all delegates to the convention. Mr. Stelzle advocated the erection of labor temples, in which the labor unions could hold their meetings. John Mitchell, among other things, said: "The labor organization has done more to advance the cause of temperance upon this continent than any other influence. Poverty has driven many a strong man to drink, and drink has driven many a strong man to poverty. A shorter work day and good wages would do more than any other agency to advance the cause of temperance. If a brewery or distillery is closed, upon its ruins will rise a factory." There is no moral difference between the convivial habits of the rich and those of the poor. The wreckage which the saloon has brought to many American workmen is painful and pitiable. The poor fellows who are thrown down and mastered by this curse answer the description of the wretched creature given by the pen of the wise man:

Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. (Prov. 23 : 29, 30.)

Money Under Carpet

When a woman died in South Norwalk, Conn., a few days ago, she was supposed not to have left a cent in the world. Her son was about to vacate the house, and stood in the doorway deliberating whether to tear up or leave the kitchen carpet. He thought it might do to cover his dog kennel, and so he pulled it up. To his astonishment he found two layers of small bills, which almost covered the entire floor. There was almost a bushel of them, and when they were counted it was discovered that they amounted to between $3,000 and $4,000. What a poor use of money this was! It could have been put out at five per cent. interest and brought her $170 a year, which she could have used in providing a more comfortable living and funds for charity. There are many who make the same poor use of their faculties, hiding them under the kitchen carpet, when by exercise they would have increased, and by putting them out at interest they would have multiplied. One of our Saviour's severest condemnations is against those persons who bury their talents instead of making use of them.

And I was afraid, and hid thy talent in the earth. His lord answered, Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. (Matt. 25 : 25-27.)

Encouragement to Young Men

The International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. held its annual meeting in New York City the other evening. Most gratifying reports were made from all parts of the territory. Senator Elihu Root commended the good sense which had always been manifested in the control of the Association in keeping out of politics, out of doctrinal theology, and out of cant and charlatanism. Mr. William C. Brown, president of the New York Central Railroad Company, among other things said: "I doubt greatly if there is any such assurance that the man at the throttle, the man at the switch, and the man at the key will be clearheaded and ready as is furnished by the Y. M. C. A. It offers a home to the railroad man where he will be comfortable and at his ease, but away from the temptations which are waiting for him everywhere else. During the recent depression, when we had idle men and idle cars, when men on half-time were watching the bulletin-boards to see how soon they could take out their engines, when our receipts had fallen off, and we were economizing in almost every item of expenditure, we did not cut off a dollar from the appropriation for the Y. M. C. A. work. It was of the greatest importance at just that time." What a tribute capital here pays to character, to the Y. M. C. A.! How aptly does the religion of Jesus fit into the hearts of these stalwart, heroic young railroad men to make them strong and true in guarding the property and lives of their fellow-men! And thus equipped, they remind us of the class which the apostle John addressed in one of his letters:

I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one. (I. John 2 : 14.)

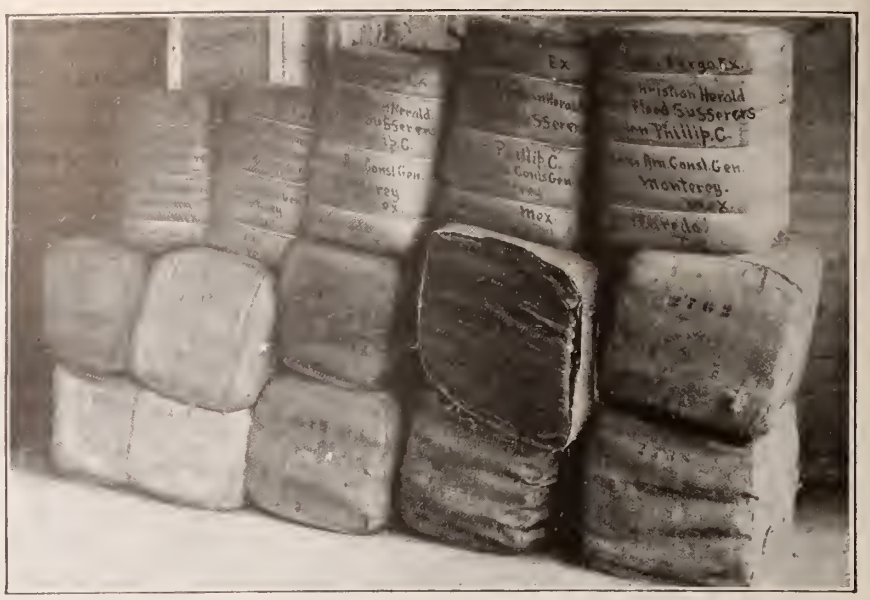
Bible Study in Columbia

While certain critics are complaining of the skeptical tendency of the teachings and influenee of American universities it is encouraging to record the fact that the careful study of the Bible in many of the colleges of the country has become so general. An exceptionally large enrolment marked the beginning of the year's Bible study work at Columbia University. Professor Herbert G. Lord, of the Department of Psychology, recommended the study of the Bible to the students as a valuable addition to a liberal education. It was announced by the Y. M. C. A. at Columbia, under whose auspices the Bible classes are held, that over 32,000 men were in last year's classes and that of this number a large proportion were college men. The Bible as literature is a great book, but its significance consists in the salvation which it reveals by faith in the blood of the crucified Son of God, in the impetus which it gives to the affairs of this world and the eternal life which it unveils.

Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me. (John 5 : 39.)

Consul-General Hanna at Relief Work

100 boxes like these were sent, each enclosing a Sewing Machine



There were 167 of these bales, each containing 120 single blankets

A Shipment of Blankets and Sewing Machines by "The Christian Herald" for Mexico's Flood Sufferers

OUR shipment of 20,000 blankets and 100 American sewing machines, contributed by our generous-hearted readers for the destitute flood sufferers in Monterey, Mexico, has reached the hands of Consul-General Hanna, whose forces are now busily at work in the relief distribution. Mr. Hanna writes to this journal, under date of Nov. 6:

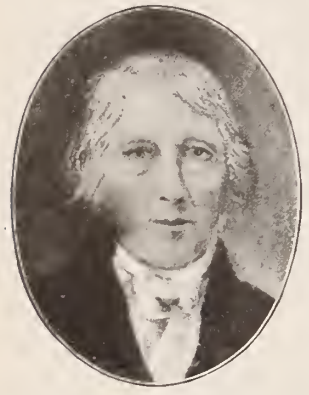
"I wish again to express my deep gratitude for the blankets and sewing machines, which Dr. Klopsch and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family are sending for the relief of the needy people in this country.

"We are now distributing these blankets in more than one hundred cities, towns and villages, and it is difficult to estimate the amount of comfort that they will afford to the needy people during the coming winter. Long live THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family!

"We shipped 1,000 bushels of shelled corn to towns in the frost belt one day this week, and we expect to ship some more soon. But really the blankets are in greater demand than anything else as the cold weather advances, as the people have very little clothing and no bedding."

Consul-General Hanna's letters show that great good has already been accomplished through the prompt generosity of the contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund. The devastation caused by the floods was far more extensive than was at first apparent, and the need is correspondingly greater. To make the work as far-reaching as possible it will be necessary to extend help to the outlying districts beyond Monterey proper, but in the same State of Nuevo Leon. All contributions for this benevolent purpose will be acknowledged in the columns of this journal.

A CENTURY OF EARNEST CHURCH WORK IN NEW YORK



Rev. C. P. Wyckoff

THE Centennial celebration of the North Baptist Church, on West Eleventh Street, New York City, brought prominently before the Christian workers of the metropolis one of the old-time sections of New York, styled "Greenwich Village," which has been well cultivated by Baptist workers in the vineyard of the Lord.

On November 13, 1809, Rev. C. P. Wyckoff and a few residents of the "Village" organized the church, which built its house of worship on Vandam Street. Later, it consolidated with another church and used this building till July 4, 1831, when a fire destroyed the house, with many others. The next building was on Macdougal Street, where this body continued till it consolidated with the church which began work at the corner of Christopher and Bedford Streets, and moved in 1881 to West Eleventh Street.

The building now occupied by this body of earnest Christian workers is a well-equipped, modern church, with an auditorium seating nearly a thousand hearers. It has introduced a "pastor's apartment" and other progressive features of church efficiency during the ministry of Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, the present pastor. The assistant pastor, Rev. W. H. Scott, is also one of the leading workers in the "Lighthouse Gospel Mission," near Abingdon Square. With Pastor Sanford, he has always stood ready to help when needed at the Bowery Mission or at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home.

Among the notable things in the history of the work of this church during the past century has been the leading place it has taken in Sunday School and benevolent effort. One of the first Sunday Schools organized in the metropolis was that which began in 1816, in the basement of the First Baptist Church building in Vandam Street. It took an early stand on the slavery question. At the very constitution of the church, adopted in 1809, Article Twenty-three of the Church Covenant stated "That no person shall be admitted to the communion of this church who is a slaveholder, nor shall any member purchase or hold a slave for life. We can only give a letter in good standing to those who hold such a description of slaves as, according to the civil law, they are not permitted to liberate."

In 1847, during the famine in Ireland, Rev. Duncan Dunbar, the then pastor in Macdougal Street, received a touching appeal addressed to his church. While other churches were discussing plans for relief, Pastor Dunbar gathered together $150 and hurried the relief to the needy. Long before the applicants for help looked for relief help came. The pastor of the needy ones in Ireland, in writing of their gratitude, said that, while visiting, he had promised help to needy families. "Dear Brother M—— had said, 'Pastor, we shall surely die,' but he had scarcely gone when the postman brought the bill of exchange for £31 1s. 3d. Then the good pastor started out to relieve the needy Irish brethren and said, as he entered the home of the needy applicant, 'Brother M——, don't die any more.'"

Rev. Ezra T. Sanford

When Rev. Jacob H. Brown was pastor at Christopher and Bedford streets Thomas Hadden, a deplorable victim of strong drink, was converted through the personal work of pastor and people, and became a notable witness to the power of Christ to save the drunkard.

Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, who is the present pastor of this Baptist wing of the Lord's Army, is an earnest and indefatigable worker, taking advantage of all of the various opportunities presented a busy city pastor. His stereopticon lectures at our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn each summer have an inspiring and ennobling effect and are greatly appreciated by the children. May the Old North Baptist Church, under his spiritual leadership, do even a still mightier work in helping to fight the Lord's battles in the years to come.

"Old Home Week," which was celebrated in the church November 7 to 14, closed with the unveiling of a beautiful portrait window, by C. Brown Darst, of New York City. It represents the first pastor, C. P. Wyckoff, and an emblem of the Sword of the Spirit breaking the chains of human slavery. On the evening of the closing service the Rev. J. B. Phillips, of Macon, Ga., began his second evangelistic campaign at this church, having lately completed a series of successful meetings at Port Richmond, S. I., and in Newark, N. J.

The Church in Greenwich Village, 1809

The Present Church Edifice

AFTER tea was over they gathered round the Captain, and it would have been a sour and sullen nature that would not have joyed itself in the exquisite home picture the big room presented. For though the living room of the family, it was a very handsome apartment — large, lofty, and furnished with a quiet splendor no one could have believed the outcome of the imagination of the big sailor who had planned it. The floor was of dark oak, and well covered with soft, rich rugs; the fireplace was a Dutch poem. It was of immense size, with jambs of glazed tiles representing scenes from the fatherland, mostly of famous ships and water ways; its accessories and fittings, even to the broad, long fender, of brightest steel. The walls were paneled halfway up in native woods. Above the paneling there was a dark green background, adorned with pictures of great value—a Titian, a Rembrandt, and three of those famous landscapes with figures by Adrian Van der Velde which were even at that day so rare and so precious in the homes of the Netherlands. The furniture was all of black oak, finely carved, trimmed and banded with brightest steel. In one big Nuremburg cabinet there were so many drawers, and tiny closets, and hiding places, that Madame after twenty years' possession was sometimes surprised by the discovery of a fresh one. Crystal and china filled the corner cupboard, silver sconces were placed at intervals on the walls, the high chimneypiece bore the arms and sea trophies of the Van Vrooms and the model of the ships in which Adrian and Sebastian Van Vroom had found out rich and strange lands for their mother Holland.

On this evening we may seat the two girls and the young man and the old Captain on the scarlet rug before the white hearth, and imagine Madame softly moving from cupboard to cupboard, and throw over all the glowing, fitful radiance of the blazing hickory logs; and thus give to our memory the background of many a Dutch family of that day in all its simple refinement and wealth of household affection.

For half an hour the Captain sat in silence, watching covertly the three young people who were whispering and laughing softly and trying to persuade Joris to do something he was not inclined to do. His reluctance at last worried the Captain, and he asked a trifle crossly:

"What is it, then, that you will not do for two pretty women? I wish that they should ask me some favor, and I would show you how a young man should carry himself."

"If they wanted you to sing, Captain, would you start off like a bird?" asked Joris.

"Like a man I would sing. If they liked it, very good; if they liked it not, that would be their own fault, not mine."

"It is only a little song, Captain," said Rose, "set to a miracle of a pretty tune, and it is about Virginia. Sing it, Mr. Lieutenant;" and then, with a masterful nod of her pretty head, "Sing it, I command you!"

Then he touched his brow with his hand, and broke into a light, lilting measure, that took the heart and feet with it; for as the words fell tripping in musical cadence from his lips, the feet of Virginia and Rose tapped the measure on the floor to them:—

Lovely Dutch American,
Fairest of the fair;
Cheeks like tinted lilies,
Braided golden hair.
Eyes as blue as heaven,
Lips as roses sweet;
Graceful as a fairy,
Every way complete.

Dearest, sweetest maiden,
From your golden hair
To your silver shoe latch,
None with you compare.
Angel, may I tell you—

"No. Not one word more may you say. I like not what you sing. It is not proper nor respectable."

"Sure, Captain," cried Rose, "it is extremely proper. All the English quality make songs about the enchanting creatures they adore."

"For the English quality that may do; it is the English way. My daughter is Dutch, thank the Giver of all Good! I will not have songs made about meine kinder [my child]—songs that will be heard, and copied, and be in every fool's mouth. For one good man is my daughter. Shall I let one hundred men sing a song about her? I will not. Moreover, I like not men to call my Virginia an angel. Men who are discontented with good women, and want angels, are great fools; good women are too good for most men. All lies! and yet in this manner life goes on. Oh, I say all this politely, for I am always polite—when good women are in my company"

"Joris broke into a light, lilting song"

—and he bowed his big head towards Rose and Virginia.

Then Virginia rose, and knelt at his knees, and put her arms around his neck, and drew his face, shining with love, down to her own. And her kiss made him in a moment placable as a baby; he smiled proudly and apologetically over the darling head nestling in his breast, and added in a voice that was thrilled through with tenderness:

"For her sake! For her sake, I said some strong words. No harm I meant. They were right words;—if they were wrong I would say, even to a little child, thy pardon!"

Then Joris rose and saluted Van Vroom:

"It is I who must say 'Thy pardon.' I have done foolishly in my ignorance. It is but a paltry excuse to plead 'I meant no harm.'"

"We are all equally guilty, Captain," cried Rose. "We are all sorry for the indiscretion. So you must forgive us all together."

"Well, then, we are reconciled. And here at last comes the good mother to put all right. Katrina, a little scolding I have had to make. Maybe it prepares me for a big one. For it is now six o'clock, and I must go to the meeting at Fraunce's Tavern to-night."

"Not to-night, Jansen."

"Yes, to-night—all our men of standing are to be there."

"Does your father go, Joris?" asked Madame.

"My father will certainly be there. He wished me also to be present."

"And why not?" asked the Captain.

"Sir, I will wait until the talking is over. When the sword is to draw, I shall be wherever there is fighting to do."

"Talking and fighting!" exclaimed Madame. "It is all foolishness! What now is the matter?"

"England has a sick king, Katrina; and his ministers are all gone crazy. They want to pass an act which will tax us sixty thousand pounds every year."

"We have paid more than that, Captain! and my father thinks we must pay this new tax."

"What if it should cost them one hundred millions of pounds to try and collect it? How much profit will they have, Lieutenant Artaveldt?"

"Treason! Rank treason!" cried Rose.

"No! No, my Lady Rose. A question I ask, that is all; a little sum in arithmetic." And turning to Joris Artaveldt he said, "In thy place I would go to the meeting. This is a quarrel in which the young men will be wanted. Many will be waiting on to-night's meeting—thy absence would be noted."

Then a rapid glance passed between Virginia and the young man, and he said, "I will go with you, sir, if you permit me that honor."

"And Jansen," added Madame anxiously, "do keep thyself well in hand and say not too much. Thou hast many temper-trying words."

"I will keep them in my heart, Katrina, unless the English party provoke me too far. It is hard to be quiet with the English. No one can suit them, very often they can not suit themselves; and if at New York they begin to rail, I will not bite my tongue to keep it quiet. No, indeed!"

"New York!"

And he took the word from Katrina. "New York!" he cried, and his voice fell to tenderest modulations. "We love New York, Katrina; right or wrong we love New York—just as we love our moeder."

Then the two men went rather noisily away, and Virginia and Rose were left very much alone. Rose threw herself into the large, luxurious chair of the master of the house. Virginia took a low stool and sat down at her side. Madame went to the big kitchen to watch the negro women at their spinning. There were eight of them stepping before the big wheels, and droning out some barbaric strain which a man, said to be one hundred and seventeen years old, was strumming on an instrument of his own making. The scene was weird, African, gloomy, almost demoniac. It was also more than real; it had all the unbearable reality of a dream. The tall, sombre forms, with one impish hump-back flitting among them, looked and moved in the dim light like monstrous shadows. Their black faces, their glowing eyes, their turbans of dead white or glaring colors, affected the imagination and made it believe they were the visions of ages, and ages, and ages ago. And this fancy was accentuated by their restless movements, their untranslatable words, and the passionate, bewildering atmosphere they unconsciously created. All these things were as fantastic surroundings for the calm, benignant white woman

SHOULD TWO YOUNG PEOPLE, WITH QUICK TEMPERS, MARRY?

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this interesting problem was submitted to our readers:

> Two young people, who know each other well, love one another truly, and fully appreciate each other's good qualities, desire to marry. But both are quick-tempered and impulsive, and, knowing this, they hesitate lest a union under such circumstances might be a mistake after all. The doubt naturally arises in their minds whether the little occasional ebullitions of temper to which both are subject would not be emphasized, rather than softened and sweetened, by the trials of wedded life. Would not the pair of fiery tempers kindle a flame of strife that would destroy all true happiness? In married life, should not one be the complement of the other, so that what is pronounced in the one may be modified by the other? Is there not more reasonable hope of happiness where a hot-tempered husband has a sweet, even-tempered wife than where both are quick and passionate?

Of course, such a question, entering as it does into the very heart of social and family life, has naturally awakened a widespread interest and we have received many letters from readers in response to our invitation to write their views. These letters come from old married folks and young wives and husbands, also from bachelors and—let us admit it—perhaps a few from unmarried ladies. By all, the question of temperament is discussed very frankly. We present these views below, and advise all to read them and to form their own conclusions. There are various remedies suggested for temperamental incompatibility, and where so many are excellent it is difficult to say which is to be preferred. To the young people who may be looking forward to having homes of their own some day, the reading of these experiences may prove profitable as well as entertaining.

The "First" and the "Last Word"

For one of a fiery temper to marry a person with a well-controlled temper, simply because "it takes two to make a quarrel," shows that its owner has no intention of using his own will power to restrain himself. Such a person is not only unfit for domestic life, but is not fit to live with his fellow-man.

There is no such thing as "first and last word" between husband and wife. The very first words that fell from the lips of man, after God created him, as reported in the Bible, preclude any such possibility. Read Gen. 2:22, 23. From the day that lesson was given the human family, the husband and wife who struggle for the last word destrey their own happiness, and lose the respect of their best friends.

To be a little afraid of giving offense is wholesome to domestic happiness. Yes; marry each other, and behave yourselves.

James and Mary and their "Tiff"

Shall persons of fiery temperament marry? I answer, "Yes! No!" The whole problem is solved right here. Is there genuine love between the parties? We assume that there is. James becomes angry at something Mary has said; he meets her pouting, and hurts her feelings. They are not married yet. After sober thought he is ashamed of his actions, and he calls himself hard names for being so hasty. He tries to gain her full love and confidence again. She, with marked disdain, passes him by. But on some favorable occasion they are brought face to face, and their spirits blend. Each, grieved for the past, strives to be more cautious for the future. Each tries to avoid in the future what would mar their happiness. But if it should occur, James can go his way and Mary can go her way. And perhaps that will be the end of it; for they are not married.

Let us suppose, however, that they marry. For a while all is bliss. Suddenly James' temper is up; the fire burns in Mary's breast; but they are husband and wife. Sober thoughts enter their minds. Their minds are restless. Tortured and troubled by such shameful conduct, James finally says softly, "Mary!" Mary's heart goes pit-a-pat. James breaks out: "Mary, will you forgive me? Oh, I am so sorry!" A soft, gentle voice is heard: "Yes, I will."

Years come and go. Trials come to these two, but the lesson taught and learned that day and that night has not been forgotten. Instead of flame and passion, the oil of love has made sweet peace, and all is well. These are not visions of a flighty mind, but views of real life. Young people, are you willing to pay the price?

Hasn't Been Angry Since 1874

The last time I gave way to anger, and spoke words with a Satanic spirit, was in 1874. This is the only time my wife ever saw me angry. My only son, who is thirty-seven years old, never saw his father angry. My neighbors never saw me angry about anything since 1874. And this occurred in a quarterly conference, when I thought my brethren were trying to bring something to light that would injure my character, and I said a few words in the wrong spirit.

A pure heart will find no trouble about keeping sweet-spirited under all circumstances.

Only One Way to Cure It

I only know of one way, and one way alone, in which two hot or quick tempered people can live together.

The grace of God, and the grace of God alone, can change both of them if they will only ask for it. Then, and not till then, can they both be happy. W. H.

How One Husband Solved the Problem

We can each mould our lives as we will, if we only determine and ask God to help us. Those high-tempered lovers have but to declare their superiority over their tempers, time and time again, and feel that they can succeed. To believe a thing, and say they believe it, helps it to grow, as putting water on a plant gives it new life. I know this by experience, and I have been a wife for over thirty-two years.

One husband I knew, who had a dearly loved wife with a quick temper. He would always leave her presence when she began her tantrums. After he had left the table at meal times a few days she began to control herself, and in a short time they would laugh over the occurrences of the past. They lived a long, happy life together.

While this couple spoken of in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be a myth, we know there are many cowards, afraid even of their own shadows. We do not know our powers until we try them. H. H. B.

Thinks They May Safely Marry

The two young people, who know each other well, love one another truly, and fully appreciate each other's good qualities, have much to justify their desire to marry. There can be no two temperaments just the same in man and woman. A man's temper will lead to one thing, a woman's to another. It depends upon the yielding of the disposition. The more sensitive nature is generally the most submissive. A hot temper is a serious thing to trust, and will oftentimes destroy the happiness of the entire household. It can never be overcome by using it, unless to exhaust it; but it can be controlled through kindness, if there is true love in the heart and mind of each.

If the trials of wedded life are to soften and sweeten, it will naturally come through that which will mellow, and the temperament will change in both if the desires and will are the same. Peace and good will will bring happiness where two are mutually agreed and united. The serious danger is the inheritance for the offspring, that will be carried down for generations. MRS. F. I. MCCREA.

Sheridan, Mont.

Thinks Opposite Tempers Should Unite

If you mix hot water and ice, in a short time you have a mixture at an even temperature. The hot water will melt the ice and the ice will cool the water. It is seen that the two, working together, causes the even temperature. Just so is it with tempers. Ardent tempers, when together, never moderate, but add fuel to the fire of indignation. But opposite tempers, when together, will always extinguish the flame of wrath.

Why are there so many divorces? Why are there so many murders? Because people of the same temperament are closely connected. And these people cannot stand a little ridicule, cannot return a kind word for a sharp one; therefore cannot agree. But associate people of different temperaments, and let the one return kind and loving words for angry and passionate ones, and you will soon notice the sharp words become more moderate.

Mechanicsburg, Pa. T. R. MEILY.

Observe the "Golden Rule"

If John's wife and mother will observe the Golden Rule, and practise it, they will have no difficulty in keeping peace and harmony in their home; and if John's mother will be helpful and industrious, she will in time become a blessing to the home. HENRIETTA LEHDE.

New York City.

Both Should Be Quick to Forgive

If both are quick-tempered, yet possessing other good qualities, as indicated, they might live happily together, provided they would guard against both losing their tempers at once. In some unguarded moment, did such occur, they, understanding the weakness, should certainly be more ready to forgive. One of sweet disposition, not understanding, would be heartbroken. MRS. FANNIE T. THOMPSON.

Berryville, Va.

Mustn't Both Get Angry at Once

If the young people mentioned would make a promise to each other, and faithfully keep it, to be sure not both to get angry at once, both tempers would soon grow even; but if they will not do this, I say let each one seek a more even-tempered companion. A fiery temper controlled is much better than a naturally mild temper, with nothing to contend with in that direction. M. E. U.

Lafayette, O.

The Spiritual Side of the Problem

The fact that they "know each other well" and realize, before marriage, the existing ill-temper and impulsiveness, gives them a great advantage over the average couple who manage to conceal these traits of character until after the union. By constant effort and the help of the Holy Spirit their tempers should be softened and their impulsive natures retarded. They should set up the family altar the day they become one, and continue the same through life, allowing nothing to interfere. Any trouble caused by an act of hasty temper should be adjusted inside of twenty-four hours. Each, realizing that they cannot seek God's help with this barrier—temper—in the way, will seek forgiveness. Each must be willing to bear with the other, and the husband should be just as quick to seek forgiveness of the wife as he expects her to seek of him. A pair of fiery tempers can be just as happy together, dominated by the true Spirit of Christ, as the sweet, even-tempered wife and the hot-tempered husband. In the first case, one could appreciate the battle that the other was fighting, while in the latter sympathy might be lacking. The salt of decision and energy must be mixed with the oil of love. "I know in my own experience that the curbing of temper is effected by a constant growth in grace. CHARLES E. PRICE.

Resolve to Be Like the Sunshine

The Crown Dictionary defines Wootz as a very fine-tempered steel. Trace it from the mine to the bread knife, in the hand of a zealous wife. Even the bread must have the ebullition of yeast for raising dough; but the fire gives it the good quality. Also, there is the rattle of the teakettle lid before the tea is tempered right; and the sugar from the cane or red beet becomes white and sweet by grinding in the mill. Petulance and temerity excluded, this pair should marry. They should resolve to be like the sunshine after the tempest.

Peapack, N. J. J. FLOMERFELT.

Grace in the Heart Will Curb Temper

The two young people in question should be converted, and the Lord will give them grace to control their tempers. I know this from my own experience. I had a quick temper when I joined the M. E. Church at twelve years of age. My mother told me I would have to pray for grace to sweeten my temper. I did, and everybody on the farm knew I was converted when I put that temper away, and He has kept me these thirty-six years since then, and I trust will keep me to the end.

They need grace to control the temper, even if they never marry. To always exert a good influence, and to be a Christian anywhere, you must be a Christian everywhere.

Mrs. Sangster's Great Book

The Story Bible, by Margaret E. Sangster, is a work every line of which is consecrated by love and hallowed by prayer and which re-tells in simple language for plain people—both old and young—the incomparable stories of the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. These stories are full of charm, tender and dramatic. There is a fascination about them practically indescribable. One learns to love the Old Book by reading these stories, and then turns to the Sacred Page to learn the minutest details. The Story Bible is truly a book among books, and will live as long as the English language survives.

The Story Bible is beautifully bound in Royal Purple and Gold; its pages number 490, and its quaint pictures add interest to this great production by Mrs. Sangster, who has endeared herself not only to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, but to the whole English-speaking world.

This choice volume delivered free, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one whole year, and our great "Dreamland" Calendar—and if you are in time, also the superb photogravure, DAUGHTERS OF DORCAS—for only TWO DOLLARS.

A New American Classic

DR. FRANCIS TREVELYAN MILLER, the editor-in-chief of The Journal of American History, has prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD exclusively a book that is destined to become an American Classic. It contains 100 stories as fascinating as they are unique. Thus he has provided entertainment for a hundred nights around the evening lamp. Nothing has been issued from the press in recent years more beautiful and more attractive in the matter of contents and production than this volume.

You never saw a book just like it, and when you see it you will crave it. It is a book that will "sell like hot cakes" without advertising, but we make this announcement in order that every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family may be induced to get it. It will be a genuine treat to you and your dear ones for a hundred nights, after which it will be read and reread over and over again by every reading member of your family.

This choice volume contains nearly 500 pages, including 16 full page illustrations, and is artistically bound in Red and Gold. It is delivered Free, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one whole year, and our great "Dreamland" Calendar (and if you are in time, also the superb photogravure DAUGHTERS OF DORCAS), all for only $2.

A PAGE FOR LITTLE FOLKS

By MARY H. NORTHEND

A Fairy Tale Bazaar

ONE of the prettiest and cleverest fairs I have ever attended was that recently given, in a suitable building, to help a suburban church. The result was most satisfactory, from the artistic as well as the financial point of view. A great deal of pains was taken by the young people, and the work—for the success of any fair means plenty of hard work—was indeed a labor of love and thought.

The motif of the whole thing was the fairy story "Cinderella," in which we delighted in our childhood. A great deal of ingenuity was exercised in the arrangement and decoration of the booths, which was brought out to a marked degree by the electrical effects.

The "Cinderella Booth" was twenty-eight feet long, and practically made three booths. The front was curved in three sections, and the lattice work underneath, painted green, was of laths. The booth was eight feet deep, and the circular projections on the front were, one eight inches, the other two feet. The top of papier maché, in the shape and coloring of a rockery, came down the sides to the top of the lattice work. Wistaria blossoms, which were used in profusion to decorate the booths, were arranged on the inside of the lower part of the rockery, while twelve large lilies, fitted with electric lights, were twined in between the rocks. The booth was boarded over on the top and covered with excelsior, dyed green, to simulate green grass. The coach, of a bright yellow pumpkin color, was trimmed inside with green cambric and, together with the mice who drew it, was made of papier maché. The picture painted at the back of the booth represents a castle, from which Cinderella and the Prince are coming out to enter the waiting coach. These pictures at the back of the booth were all framed, and the framing was made of a piece of board about half a foot wide, covered with yellow cambric, which was first dipped into a preparation of glue and crinkled. The roof of this booth was on an incline of eighteen inches.

The "Jack in the Beanstalk" booth had two front projections of green lattice work, and was fourteen feet long and eight deep. The sides and top were ornamented by papier maché to imitate stone work, and represented the exterior of a castle. The top was two feet in from the front proper of the booth, and two feet beyond that was the head of the giant, which was also made of papier maché. The rest of the castle was painted on the background against the wall. Up one side of the booth, the beanstalk was climbing, made of leaves wound around wood, and in among them was Jack, a life-size figure of a seven-year-old boy. The picture on the background was framed in the same manner as those in the Cinderella booth.

The "Cat and the Fiddle" booth was made of two-by-three-foot uprights, of common laths painted white, and was fourteen feet long by eight feet deep. Crimson rambler roses were trained from the floor up across the top. The picture painted at the back of the booth across the wall was framed like the others, and represents the cow jumping over the moon, with a glimpse of landscape. To make the scene more realistic, part of an old fence was set up three feet in front of the picture, on the right of which were placed pasteboard figures of the cat with her fiddle, and the dog grinning from ear to ear; and, at the left, the smiling dish attempting to run off with the spoon, which wore a most doleful expression.

The Candy booth was a centre of attraction. This booth was in the shape of a half circle, the rounded part in front, the latice work of laths being painted brown, while supporting the booth were five huge candy canes. These canes were of furring covered first with pasteboard, then with white cloth, which had been dipped into a preparation of glue. A strip of red cambric, also dipped into the preparation, was wound tightly about the cane, and a lot of isinglass was sprinkled over all. The curved top of another cane served as a perch for the old woman, who, with regulation hat and streaming hair, was seated astride her steed, a long broom, which her faithful cat was trying to climb. In the background on the wall was a painting ten feet square, while lower down, at the feet of the old woman, were representations of others riding in the air. The effect, especially when various attendants from different booths, all wearing peaked hats, sauntered by, was most unique.

Under the balcony were three compartments really forming one booth. The lattice-work front was similar to that of other booths, but painted green. Clusters of wistaria blossoms were arranged gracefully along the top front, and at intervals on pedestals were placed four life-size figures of Indian Rajahs, fantastically conceived and built. One's imagination can be drawn upon for the making of these figures, and much latitude allowed for ingenuity. These figures were dressed in green and brown, trimmed with red. The central booth of the three was devoted to the grab. The figure of a clown, the head and cap being made of papier maché, with flowing gown of white cloth decorated with spots of red paint, was set up upon a box in front. The face, painted to imitate that of a circus clown, had an enormous mouth, in which the visitor put his hand and brought forth a prize. On either side were the young women attendants at the booth, wearing white waists and capes of black, thrown over one shoulder, and the tall, pointed hats. This booth was, as always at a fair, the haunt of the children, and many of the older ones patronized the clown for the fun of drawing a prize from such a novel grab.

What He Wanted

M. GEORGES CLEMENCEAU, ex-Premier of France, some time ago at election time established a free dispensary and consultation room in his electoral quarter, says a correspondent. One morning a man entered, and M. Clemenceau, who was a doctor before he became a politician, brusquely told him to take off his shirt so that he might be examined. After looking at the visitor's tongue and feeling his pulse, Clemenceau remarked, "Not much wrong here. What do you think you want?" "I want to be postman," replied the man. He got an appointment.

Goes to School at Sixty

JAMES SHANDLEY, a carpenter of sixty years, is enrolled as a student in elementary Latin and mathematics at the evening classes of a New York public school. He is counted the most spirited, attentive and able student in the class, despite his years. He is alert and quick to learn, but was denied all opportunities for schooling in his boyhood days, which were spent in Ireland.

"It does seem a bit strange for an old fellow like me to be putting in my time studying at night, doesn't it?" Mr. Shandley said. "But for me it's the greatest pleasure in the world. Ever since I was a youngster I was a capable, logical and formidable debater. And that, mind you, in spite of the fact that I had no learning whatever. While I do not expect to be another Daniel O'Connell, still as I was gifted by nature to climb to my feet any time and speak extemporaneously on most any subject I think it would be a crime for me to neglect to put that talent to its best possible use."

An Observing Child

LITTLE Ruth is the five-year-old daughter of a Methodist minister in one of the large city churches. One evening she climbed upon her father's knee, and, in her most coaxing way, asked him to buy her a dolly.

"But, Ruth," objected her father, "I haven't the money."

"Well," replied the child quickly, "why can't you take up another special collection?"

watching them, as any vision from the under world—though it were steeped in unfathomable dolor, and tinctured with incipient madness—could evoke.

Madame appeared to be conscious of this influence and yet unconscious of its source and power; for she joined the girls frequently, and was restless, and like a woman troubled by unseen forces. It had never occurred to her that a conjunction of these dark, alien natures might be actively inimical to mental and bodily sanity. She admitted "being ill at ease"; and she had "all sorts of queer feels about her"; then, she explained, she was "very anxious about the Captain."

"More words will be in his mouth than his good sense can manage," she said to Virginia; and Virginia answered:

"When father speaks, mother, he says just the words that are needed. Every one listens to him. Father has much wisdom."

"That is so;—but sometimes silence is the best wisdom."

So Katrina went backward and forward, taking thought for all and suffering nothing to be wasted. And Virginia and Rose sat by the fire and talked; that is, Rose talked and Virginia listened, full of wonder and interest. For at that day the life, and especially the court life, of old England was an everlasting romance to Americans; and when Rose talked of Cressacre Castle and its splendid life, and of the marvelous goings on in London society, Virginia was as happily curious as a child reading a fairy story.

Finally they wearied a little, and Rose wondered "if that young god of war, Lieutenant Artaveldt, would return with the Captain?" Virginia was sure he would not.

"Then I propose we go upstairs; my slippers hurt me, the fastenings are too tight;" and Virginia rose and began to light the night candles, and Rose stooped to unfasten the silver latches of her shoes.

Suddenly the door was thrown open, some one entered, there was a cry of wonder and joy, and Rose, rising, saw a handsome youth holding Virginia to his heart, kissing her face, calling her "dear Virginia; sweet Virginia!" while Virginia was evidently returning his endearments. For a moment or two Rose watched them with a curious pleasure, then she cried out:

"Most amazing! Most delightful! I never, no, I never, saw the like. It is beyond belief! It is beautifully impossible! Are you in your senses, Virginia Van Vroom, or am I dreaming?"

"It is my brother, Rose; my dear, dear brother Arent! I am so happy I forgot you."

"That is easily seen; perhaps you will now remember."

"Forgive me, Arent, this is my dear friend, Lady Rose Harley."

Then Rose and Arent looked at each other, and their eyes, meeting, dilated and flashed, while the blood rushed crimson over their faces. For Love, that old, old troubler, which times its birth from the first glance, had really introduced them to each other. Rose felt as if something secret and incredible had happened. For a moment or two she was conscious of a celestial ecstasy, that her common sense rebuked as an invasion into her proper orbit of an influence alien and perhaps dangerous. But to Arent all heaven and earth was in that one bright flash. He could not speak, he did not wish to speak. To multiply that wonderful moment by one thousand would have made him a god. Rose understood. She saw the miracle that had taken place; and she laughed softly, and said:

"Captain, ten times welcome! Virginia and I will now have a servant. For I do assure you, the men here are so full of their petty politics that they do not deserve a courtesy in the way of wages. Virginia, where are you going?"

"To tell my mother that Arent is here. I will be back—in two minutes I will be back."

Then Arent, with all his soul in his face, stood still looking straight into the lovely countenance that seemed to cast supernal light upon his own. He tried to speak, and quite naturally—all his reason being swallowed up in a pleasure so great as to be next to paining—he blundered into the impertinence of Rose's nationality, a thing he cared nothing at all about.

"You are English, I suppose?"

He said the words mechanically, for he was looking, not listening, as he spoke. And Rose perceived his mistake, excused it in her heart, but answered it with a raillery Arent did not know how to take.

"English? No, I am American, New York, but fairly true and honest—at least, when it is convenient to me."

And then she spread out her skirts, and sent one more flashing bolt of love from the heaven of her eyes, and left him alone. And he was so confounded that he forgot to open the door for her.

As soon as it was too late, he was shocked at his want of politeness. "I shall not earn even a courtesy in the way of wages," he said; "but it is all so amazing, so delightful! Am I in my senses? Am I Arent Van Vroom, captain of the privateer Manhattan, or some other man? I wonder me what has happened."

Then his mother came joyfully into the room, and in her embrace he realized his personality. "Arent! Arent! My boy! My boy!" she cried; and her boy kissed her lips, and stroked her hair, and put his bewitched senses under those motherly compensations which fill the heart with comfort, with sweet satisfaction, and the great peace of possession.

Virginia quickly disappeared and Madame was glad of it. She wanted her boy all to herself. She watched him eating the meal she had hastily set before him, and fed her hungry mother heart with the sight of his beauty and the music of his voice. She did not ask him where he had been, or from whence he had sailed. It was sufficient for her that he was at her side, that she could touch his hands, and see him lift his bright, steadfast eyes to meet hers. Politics troubled neither of them. Madame said, "There is a deal of uneasiness in New York now," and Arent answered:

"That is so. I thought to myself as I hurried through the city that it was gone mad in all forms of madness. What is the matter at all with such sensible people? Will the fever catch?"

"Your father has taken it. I know not how it will go. It is old England, of course. Why are they so foolish over the sea?"

"Well, then, mother, the most able Englishmen retired to New York when Charles the First was king. It seems also that you have an English guest; tell me, mother, about her."

"You have seen her then?"

"Yes; and Virginia said she was Lady Rose—I forget the other name."

"Harley. Forget all her name, if you are a wise man. She is not of your kind. She is the granddaughter of the Earl of Cressacre. Her father is Lord Francis Harley, his youngest son. He is now with the English army of occupation in Canada. His daughter was left in the care of Governor Colden. She likes not the Coldens, but she has a great love for thy sister. It is a love that has grown very quickly, so then it may soon grow cold."

"Where is the young girl's mother?"

"Dead these many years; she was brought up by her aunt, the Duchess of Portman, by whom, Rose says, she was 'laboriously trained in all the foibles of the people of the pinnacle.'"

"And tell me, mother, what brought her from the pinnacle of English society to New York?"

"She was sick, she was weary of society, she wished to be with her father on the voyage, she has much property here, her mother was a New Yorker, Lady Rose was born in Maiden Lane—many reasons she can give. Who knows which if any may be the true one? She is sweet and good; we do not ask her any questions. Colonel Harley may come for her any day—to-morrow even he may come."

"Dear mother, I hope not. Such a charming girl! I would like to see plenty more of her."

"I tell thee, thy moeder tells thee, think in no way at all about Lady Rose. A thousand objections thy father and her friends would make. Take these words into thy heart. They are for thy peace and welfare. And now thou must go to sleep."

Then Arent bid his mother a long, sweet good-night, and went to his room.

CHAPTER TWO

THE BEGINNING OF TROUBLE

IT was very late when Jansen returned home, and he was under such great excitement, Katrina would not suffer him to talk. "To-morrow morning," she said, "will be soon enough to tell us about the King's business. Besides, here is news of our own. Arent came home to-night." And to Katrina's amazement, the Captain looked annoyed at his son's advent.

"Art thou not pleased?" she asked with some anger. "More than one year he has been away—on thy business, too."

"I wish, then, he had had the good sense to stay, now, a little longer."

"He heard of the French peace at Kingston, and then took a cargo to Boston, where he found every man talking of the King's tyranny, and of what would be the end of it."

"Yes; and what had Arent to do with the King's tyranny? I did not expect Arent to hear of the peace—no right had he to hear of it. In his place nothing could have made me understand such a foolish thing—on the sea, too, where a good sailor, on a good ship like our Manhattan, makes the peace when he wants it, and not one minute before."

"Well, then, talk to Arent in the morning."

"Where is he?"

"In his bed, asleep."

"Very undutiful is that. Thou should have made him wait for me."

"Not so. He was tired to death, and to-night thou art not fit to talk with reason to any one. Were the men at the meeting all mad? for thou hast caught a bad temper from them."

Then Jan laughed. "To-night," he said, "we had plenty of good Christian railing, and some men said so much they will not say another word to each other, not so long as they live. De Lancey was red-hot with pride and temper. 'All through the city,' he said, 'treason is simmering.' The Livingstons only waited to see how De Lancey went, and then on the other side they trumpeted. As for Rutgers, so civilly impertinent and sarcastic were his remarks that Elder Semple advised 'the Government to look after the vituperative Rutgers.'"

"And you held your peace, Jan? That was right."

"Well, then, a few words I said. The example was bad, Katrina. But it was only the truth I told them, for always I speak the truth."

"Now, Jan, thy tongue is growing too hot, and too overdoing; go to thy bed. It is sleep thou wants. About the meeting thou shalt talk in the morning."

"To bed! I will not be driven by anyone. No!"

"Well then, take thy own time. Thou hast kept me out of my bed too long. Look once at the clock. It is past midnight."

SUBSCRIBERS to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may confidently look forward to a continual series of extraordinary surprises during the coming year. We lack space to enumerate them one and all, so we will just tarry long enough to say that no other Magazine will afford its readers a greater wealth of features, both literary and pictorial, than those in store for our own readers. Some of these features are still in course of preparation, but there are enough now in hand to make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD worth $10 for next year's subscription. The year 1910 will be the greatest in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thus far.

Tell all your friends about it and induce them to subscribe, and rest assured that they will thank you for your service. You will do us and them a good service and you yourself will be pleased with the result.

An Eskimo Hunt in Far Labrador

they have been pleased to send for our Moravian Mission work. Our Eskimos live more or less at the Mission Station in the winter time; in the spring, summer and autumn, however, they secure their living away from the station, at some of our bays, capes or islands. Here we lose sight of them for a while, and we much regret that it is impossible for us to visit them more frequently. We find, in some instances, that the good work done during the winter months is counterbalanced by outside influences from the occasional visits of some of the Southern fishermen. I therefore cannot help thinking how much more effective our work would be if we had a motorboat at our disposal. We could then visit the people frequently, and advise, help and influence them, and learn more of their peculiar difficulties and the ways and means to remedy them.

One thousand five hundred to 2,000 schooners fish regularly on this coast every summer. A motorboat would enable us to visit their harbors, and hold services among these fishermen. Our own society cannot provide such an addition to our work.

If we could procure such a boat with the help of good friends in America, to my fellow-workers as well as to myself it would be a deep satisfaction to know that all within our power was done to make the Moravian Mission still more effective.

SECRET WORKER

The Plan Upon Which Coffee Operates.

Coffee is such a secret worker that it is not suspected as the cause of sickness or disease, but there is a very sure way to find out the truth.

A lady in Memphis gives an interesting experience her husband had with coffee. It seems that he had been using it for some time and was an invalid.

The physician in charge shrewdly suspected that coffee was the "Worm at the root of the tree," and ordered it discontinued with instructions to use Postum regularly in its place.

The wife says: "We found that was the true remedy for his stomach and heart trouble and we would have gladly paid a hundred times the amount of the doctor's charge when we found how wise his judgment was.

"The use of Postum instead of coffee was begun about a year ago, and it has made my husband a strong, well man. He has gained thirty-five pounds in that time and his stomach and heart trouble have all disappeared.

"The first time I prepared it I did not boil it long enough and he said there was something wrong with it. Sure enough it did taste very flat but the next morning I followed directions carefully, boiling it for fifteen minutes, and he remarked 'this is better than any of the old coffee.'

"We use Postum regularly and never tire of telling our friends of the benefit we have received from leaving off coffee."

Look for the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Preparation for the Life Eternal*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE apostle Paul is the second time a prisoner in Rome, not in his own house, as during his first imprisonment, but in the lower dungeon of the Mamertine prison. Paul had been placed there by the Emperor Nero, under the false charge that he had incited the Christians to burn the city of Rome, which was Nero's way of accounting for the conflagration of six days that had laid the larger part of Rome in ashes. The truth probably was that the Emperor Nero had himself started the conflagration, and charged the Christians with it in order to escape the infamy.

It is a part of history that Nero, in punishing the Christians for the crime, had multitudes arrested; and some he had covered with skins of wild beasts and dogs turned loose upon them, to tear them in pieces; others he had covered with pitch and fastened to stakes, and then set on fire, while he himself rode between the avenues thus lighted! Paul was saved this fate, being a Roman citizen, and was put into the dungeon, to be put to death by the sword. Four or five years probably elapsed between the first and second imprisonments, and Paul spent those years preaching the Gospel again in Asia, and perhaps in Spain.

But as to Paul's trial, he wrote concerning it to Timothy: "When I was first heard in my defense no man stood by me, but all forsook me. I pray that it be not laid to their charge." It was the custom in Greek and Roman courts to allow friends of the accused to intercede for him, and to endeavor by their prayers and tears to move the feelings of the judges. But evidently Paul's friends considered it dangerous to appear in his defense. But he adds in the letter to Timothy: "Nevertheless, the Lord Jesus stood by me and strengthened me in my heart." Whether the Son of God was visible, or whether Paul felt him in his heart, we cannot tell. How dark that lower dungeon! We marvel how there could have been light in it sufficient for Paul to see how to write; perhaps a faint glimmer of light came down through the grating which was in the floor of the prison above; possibly Paul might have been permitted to have a small taper for light. How precious that second letter to Timothy, written in the dungeon, and containing the last words penned by the great apostle! We should not be content to read only a part of it, but the whole. It contains only eighty-three verses, which could certainly be read thoughtfully in half an hour or less. A traveler visiting Rome to-day would find no difficulty in finding Paul's prison. He could go to the Roman Forum, and look for the small church at the left of the arch of Septimius Severus. On the church is a small bas-relief representing St. Peter and St. Paul in prison. It is the church of San Giuseppe de Falegnami —St. Joseph of the Carpenters, built in 1639. It is built over the Mamertine prison. Having entered the church, one must descend a flight of stairs to reach the upper prison, and still another flight to reach the Tullianum, or lower dungeon. The visitor should have his Bible in hand, and by the light of his taper read: "The time of my departure is come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give to me at that day, and not to me only, but also to all them that have loved his appearing." Then the visitor should climb the stairs, go out of the church, and sit down near by, on the stones, and read the remaining words of Paul's letter, in which he so kindly mentions his friends by name, and asks the blessing of God upon them: "The Lord be with thy spirit. Grace be with you." The visitor may feel that he has a share in this blessing. Let him then rise, and take a carriage for a drive of three miles to the church of St. Paul, outside the walls of the city. The church is supposed to stand upon the spot where Paul was beheaded, probably in A.D. 67. There have been several edifices on this spot, the first erected between 78 and 91, a small oratory; later, a church by Constantine, in A.D. 324. Many restorations and embellishments have been made, and it is now magnificent in the interior, with its eighty antique marble columns, thirty-eight feet and six inches high and twelve feet in circumference. But the feature that will interest the visitor most is the high altar under which rest the remains of the apostle of the Gentiles; but not the head, that having been removed to the church of St. John Lateran, which is the church in which the Popes are crowned. The skull of Paul is exhibited during one day in the year, together with the skull of Peter. They were seen by us in 1880. We do not vouch for their genuineness.

It is composed of words of action: Preach, Reprove, Rebuke, Exhort.

How and when to use the legacy? Be urgent. In season. Out of season. With long suffering and teaching. Be sober (earnest); suffer hardship; do the work of an evangelist; fulfil thy ministry. The date of the legacy: "I am already being offered." And when he wrote this Paul had in mind the pouring out of a libation, which was according to Greek and Roman custom the conclusion of a sacrifice.

The full inheritance: A crown of righteousness to all them who love the Lord Jesus, an immortal crown which fadeth not away.

Death to Paul was being crowned. And so it is we may learn to live and die like him; not the martyr's death, perhaps, but not afraid to look death in the face. Dr. W—— was one day dressing the wound of a soldier, who had been shot in the neck near the carotid artery. It had not been regarded as a particularly dangerous case, but suppuration set in, and while the doctor was cleansing the wound the bloodvessel gave way. Dr. W—— quickly put his finger into the aperture and stopped the flow. The soldier glanced questioningly into the doctor's face and asked, "What does it mean?" "It means death, my poor fellow," he answered with strong sympathy in his voice. A moment the soldier lay with closed eyes, as if stunned by the fatal words, then looked up calmly and asked, "How long can I live?" "Until I remove my finger," answered the doctor. "Will you wait a little," the poor man asked, "until I can write a few words to my wife?" The doctor bowed his head affirmatively. The soldier wrote his brief letter, and then, with resignation, said, "I am ready, doctor." The doctor removed his finger, and in a little while the brave fellow was dead. Are you ready? Am I ready? We are if we have made our peace with God through his beloved Son, the Lord Jesus, who came into this world to save sinners. God's promise is that whoever believeth on him hath eternal life.

Dr. T. De Witt Talmage once said: "The way out of this world is so blocked up with coffin and hearse, and undertaker's spade and screwdriver, that the Christian can hardly think as he ought to of the most cheerful passage in all his history. . . . We think of it as a dark hole, in which a man stumbles when his breath gives out. Paul takes that great clod of a word 'death' and throws it away, and speaks of his 'departure'—a beautiful, bright, suggestive word, descriptive of every Christian's release. . . . I am ready now to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." Hark! What is that shuffling of feet in the upper dungeon? Why, Paul has an invitation to a banquet, and he is going to dine to-day with the King. Those shuffling feet are the feet of the executioners. They come, and they cry down through the hole in the dungeon, "Hurry; come, now, and get yourself ready." Why, Paul was ready. He had nothing to pack up, he had no baggage to take; he had been ready a good while. I see him rising up and straightening out his stiffened limbs, and pushing back his white hair from his wrinkled forehead, and see him looking up through the hole in the roof of the dungeon in the face of his executioner, and hear him say: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." Then they lift him out of the dungeon and start to the place of execution. They say "Hurry." Three miles is a good way for an old man to travel after he has been whipped and crippled with maltreatment. But they soon get to the place of execution, Aqua Salvia, and he is fastened to the pillar of martyrdom. He makes no resistance. Oh, Paul! Why not strike for your life? No, Paul was not going to interfere with his own coronation!

Sunday School Lesson

When Paul was leaving so little on this side the pillar of martyrdom, to gain so much on the other side, do you wonder at the cheerful valedictory? "The time of my departure is at hand."

Paul's pen stopped only by death. The last words of his letter to Timothy read as if he was still writing when he heard the executioners overhead. In this we are reminded of the venerable Bede, who spent the last days of his life in translating the Gospel of John. When he saw that death was approaching, he did not give up his work and turn to meditation, but with intense earnestness pushed forward the almost completed translation. On the last night before his death he continued dictating to his amanuensis until his increasing weakness attracted the attention of that person, who said to him: "There remains now only one chapter, but it seems difficult for you to speak." He replied: "It is easy. Take your pen, dip it in ink, and write as fast as you can." When it was nearly completed, Wilberch, the amanuensis, again aroused him, for he thought him dying, and he said: "Master, there is now only one sentence wanting." Bede bade him write quickly. Presently Wilberch said: "Now it is finished." Bede replied: "Thou hast said the truth: consummatum est." He immediately desired to be placed where he had been accustomed to pray, at the prayer stool, "prie-Dieu." And then he exclaimed, with expiring breath: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost." In connection with this incident, let us read in tender mood that last chapter of the Gospel of John, and also the last chapter of II. Timothy, which will henceforth in a most sublime manner be associated together for us.

Paul's preparation for death. Six years before he wrote his last will and testament, in the letter to Timothy, he had told his friends: "I am ready to die for the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 21:13). And he could not have so spoken if he had not been "ready" long before that moment. We should always be ready for death, because the coming of it is uncertain.

6% Irrigation Bonds

Secured by a Thousand Farms

The security back of Irrigation bonds is first liens on farm lands—sometimes a thousand farms.

These liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. They are paid in annual installments. The land which secures them is generally worth four times the lien.

The trustee may hold a thousand such liens—given by a thousand farmers on a thousand separate farms—as security for the bonds as a whole.

The farms under lien are among the most fertile farms in America. And the perpetual water right, which the lien secures, multiplies the land's value. The first crop is usually more than sufficient to pay the whole lien.

The land is not subject to crop failures, because the farmer controls his water supply. The earnings are large and sure.

A bond issue based on a thousand such liens is, in our estimation, the safest sort of security.

Additional Security

Irrigation bonds are additionally secured by a first mortgage on all the property owned by the Irrigation Company. The investment in this property is often twice the bond issue.

Thus, in addition to the many farm liens, we have this corporation and all of its property pledged to the fulfillment of all obligations.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued, like School bonds, by organized districts. Such bonds form a tax lien on all the taxable property of the community.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued under the "Carey Act," where the State supervises the project.

73 Issues Sold

During the past 15 years we have sold 73 separate issues of Drainage and Irrigation bonds, all secured by farm liens. Every obligation under every bond has been promptly met.

These bonds have become, with most of our customers, the most popular bonds that we handle. Now, we have first pick of these projects, because of our dominant place in this field.

Our own engineers and attorneys investigate every feature. An officer of our Company constantly resides in the irrigated sections, watching the projects we finance. Thus, our customers secure only the very cream of Irrigation bonds.

Ideal Investments

Such Irrigation bonds as we handle are regarded as ideal investments. The security approaches the absolute.

They are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years, so one may obtain any desired maturity. The denominations are $100, $500 and $1,000, so one may invest either little or much.

The demand for irrigated land is so great, and the projects so profitable, that the bonds pay six per cent. That is a higher rate than can now be obtained on any large class of equal securities.

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, based on our vast experience. Every investor, small or large, should read it. The book is free. Cut out this coupon, as a reminder to write for it.

January Investments

For January investors we have on hand 100 varieties of bonds. They include Municipal, Public Utility, Water Power, Corporation and Irrigation Bonds. Please ask for our list. Cut out this reminder so you won't forget.

TEDDY'S ADVENTURES IN AFRICA. Performed by

NEW Additions to Schoenhut's HUMPTY DUMPTY CIRCUS TOYS

TOYS THAT GLADDEN THE HEARTS OF OUR DEAR LITTLE ONES

You can start a circus with a few pieces then keep adding until your Greatest Show on Earth is complete. If you have a Circus outfit, get your dealer t show you the NEW additions for 1909—"Teddy and a complete African jungle outfit."

THE NEWEST AND BEST UNBREAKABLE TOY. The elephant can do tricks you never heard of. The donkey is "cuter" than any animal Barnum ever had. Then there is the horse, the hobo and the dog, the ringmaster, the lady rider, the negro and the goat. The clowns make grown-up people, as well as children laugh for hours. No end to the funny tricks discovered every day. The figures are made of solid wood, jointed like French dolls, painted in oil colors; the clowns and others are dressed in fancy costumes. Will stand the roughest kind of treatment; children never tire of it and mothers say it's the greatest toy they ever saw. SOLD IN SETS, 50c to $25.00 and over, according to the number of figures in a set. If your dealer cannot supply you, send us his name and we will mail you literature with latest illustrations, free.

Uncle Reuben's Day of Joy

THERE was a notable anniversary celebration a few weeks ago at the old Jerry McAuley Mission, in Water Street, New York City. A white-haired, venerable and dignified old man, with an alert, kindly face, was the guest of honor and the recipient of many attentions. He was Reuben Johnson, of Newburgh-on-Hudson, N. Y., who will reach his ninetieth birthday if he lives until April 15 next.

But it was a different birthday which "Uncle" Reuben and his friends had met to celebrate. Nineteen years ago Reuben, who had become a victim of drink, had come forward in the old Jerry McAuley Mission and accepted Christ as Saviour and announced his earnest desire for divine help to enable him to lead a better life. It was one of those conversions that hold good, for never since that day has Uncle Reuben forsaken his new allegiance nor gone back into his old life of sin.

Reuben Johnson

"I never felt better or happier in my life than now," he said to those who surrounded him with kind greetings. "I am a Christian, and the old appetite for liquor has completely left me. I was as low as a man could be. I was debased with self-inflicted wretchedness, and rum was the cause of it. I have now something that sustains, that satisfies me, and the result is contentment."

This old man, now verging on ninety, began work when he was fourteen years old in the pressroom of a New York daily newspaper. He learned to drink, but had a Christian mother. After her death he married, and, when his wife died, he abandoned himself recklessly to drink. He tells of his downfall and reformation:

"I went to rum for solace," he said, "and then when I got sober my conscience would chide me and accuse me, and to escape from self-reproach I would have recourse to drink, and so it went on until, before I was aware of it, the habit had enslaved me and bound me in shackles that, strive as I would, I could not break." Then his employer discharged him, and for years he lived a precarious existence, swiftly sinking to the very lowest social depths. "I had no faith in myself," he said, while tears of gratitude stole down his cheeks, "but I asked Jesus to help me, and he did, and for nineteen happy years he has kept me, blessed be his precious name! There is only one permanent cure for drunkenness, and that is the blood cure, Jesus, and he alone can save."

This is in substance Uncle Reuben's story of his transformation, as he has told it on every succeeding anniversary of the event in the Water Street Mission hall, where he "first saw the light."

Only INDIA PAPER Red Letter Bible

THERE are innumerable Red Letter Bibles, yet there is only one genuine Edition, and that is issued exclusively by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Louis Klopsch is the originator of the Red Letter Bible, and our edition is protected against infringement; but there are many cheap, imperfect and absolutely unreliable Red Letter Bibles, unworthy the name. Our Red Letter Bible is also the only one printed on India paper, and weighs only TWENTY OUNCES.

This great work, on the preparation of which Dr. Klopsch spent five months, contains the following Red Lettering: In the New Testament, every word uttered by our Lord and Saviour is in red; in the Old Testament, every passage or incident to which our Lord made reference during his earthly ministry is in red, and every passage in the Old Testament considered a Messianic prophecy pointing to Christ as the coming Saviour of the World is indicated by a Red Star.

This is a Bible well worth having, no matter how many other Bibles you may already own.

One Hundred leading clergymen assisted in determining which of the words contained in Revelation are to be attributed to Christ.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Red Letter Bible stands alone as an unerring guide to the utterances of our Lord and Saviour and to the Messianic prophecies contained in the Holy Writ.

This superb Bible, beautifully bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red under gold, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and our "Dreamland" Calendar, is offered at only $3; but if you can afford an extra dollar, by all means send $4 and get the genuine Morocco Edition, equal to any $10 Bible issued.

Simply Free—That Is All

YOU do not have to pay for the superb 18x21 Photogravure entitled "Daughters of Dorcas." You get it free if your renewal or new subscription is mailed on or before December 31, 1909. We exhibited the first proofs to a number of friends, and each thought that $5 would fairly represent the value of that beautiful picture.

This exquisite Art Photogravure represents five lovely young women sewing for poor children and another sweet girl reading aloud for their entertainment. Nothing lovelier ever adorned your home. When you get this picture you will exclaim, with thousands of others, "How can they do it?" But you know from experience that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does do things that no one else seems able to do, and you as a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family share the benefit.

Please do not delay your renewal beyond December 31, else you will lose this exceptional treat which we have provided for those whose renewal or new subscription is mailed before the last midnight bell of the old year peals out its welcome to the new year. Tell your friend about it before it is too late.

☞VERY IMPORTANT. No matter when your subscription expires, you can get this beautiful picture now. Even though you anticipate your renewal, you do not lose a single copy, as your subscription is simply DATED AHEAD one whole year from its present time of EXPIRY. Please bear this in mind. It holds good in every case and under all circumstances.

Can You Raise Eggs?

Among people who can afford luxuries, there is great demand for a regular supply of fresh eggs. The few growers who can furnish them regularly, winter and summer alike, get very high prices.

The Corning Egg-Book

(entitled "$6.41 per Hen per Year,") tells how two men, in poor health, starting four years ago with only thirty hens, made from their little egg-farm a clear profit of over $12,000 last year. It tells all about their experience, their failures, their methods, and how others, men or women, with good sense, care, and faithful work, can make money in the same way. The Corning Egg-Book is sold in combination with the

In the New Bowery Mission

By REV. JOHN BANCROFT DEVINS, D.D.

In the New York "Observer," November 11

PERHAPS the finest Rescue Mission plant in the world is being dedicated this week by the Bowery Mission of New York. During the week of dedication eminent clergymen like Bishop James H. Darlington, of Harrisburg; Dr. Wallace McMullen, Dr. J. Wesley Hill, Dr. C. H. Mead, Dr. George Alexander, Dr. J. M. Farrar, Dr. C. E. Jefferson, Dr. A. F. Schauffler, Dr. W. C. Stinson and Dr. A. F. Underhill will preach. Popular soloists such as Mrs. Adele Lais Baldwin, Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss and Dr. Ion Jackson will sing. There will also be several evangelistic services, and testimonies given at the meetings by men who have left a life of sin and are striving to lead a life of holiness.

Three features of these services are as noteworthy as the characteristics of the building itself. The public announcement is made that "no collections are taken, no subscriptions are invited and no contributions received at any of the meetings." Surely here is a place where rich and poor may meet together on common ground. Dr. Louis Klopsch, the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is the president of the Mission; J. G. Hallimond is its efficient superintendent, and Mrs. Sarah J. Bird is the "Mother of the Bowery Men." For thirty years this work has been carried on like the Eddystone Lighthouse, "to give light and to save life." Nobly has it fulfilled its double mission, never better than today and never more needed than at this time. In its model building, finely equipped for efficient service and strongly manned, and heartily backed by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a splendid future is assured.

Dr. Klopsch is a man of unusual resources, and he showed this characteristic in a pleasing manner on Sunday afternoon, when he gathered two hundred and fifty children from the missions and settlements in the city, who had been guests of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, near Nyack, N. Y., and led them in a song service. The platform at the back of the room and the visitors' gallery, all of the main floor not occupied by the children, and all of the standing room allowed by the authorities, were occupied by friends of the Mission and friends of the Children's Home. Dr. Klopsch led the singing, which was spirited and helpful. Although the children remain at Mont-Lawn only ten days in the summer they take in enough religion in their song services to make them wise unto salvation. One hymn consisted of nine verses of Scripture, so arranged that the voices glided from one into the other as naturally as if they were singing as many verses of a hymn. These Scripture verses contained the heart of the Gospel and were sung by Protestants, Catholics and Jews with equal enthusiasm. The patriotic songs were sung by the children of Germans, Irish, Russians, Hungarians, Italians, and others, born in America or in Europe, as if all were to the manner born, and with evident sincerity each child showed loyalty to the Stars and Stripes, which hung over the platforms, in this impressive oath:

"I pledge allegiance to my flag, and to the Republic for which it stands, one Nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Every child waved with vigor an American flag, as they sang with a will the chorus of one song:

Then hurrah for our flag, our country's flag!
Its stripes and white stars, too!
There is no flag in any land
Like our own red, white and blue.

The song service was similar to those led by Dr. Klopsch in the summer at Mont-Lawn, and it was greatly enjoyed by those who have been to this model Fresh Air Home, overlooking the Hudson, as well as by the larger number who know about the beautiful work carried on there through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The moral precept inculcated in song at this summer resort may be gathered from these choruses from two hymns:

G, double o, d—good,
G, double o, d—good;
We will try to be like Jesus—
G, double o, d—good.

It never pays to be bad,
No, it never pays to be bad;
It makes one feel so mean inside,
It never pays to be bad.

The Rev. Stephen Merritt, for half a century interested in rescue mission work, and now the chaplain at Mont-Lawn, offered prayer and spoke briefly. Others who offered their congratulations to Dr. Klopsch and spoke to the children were Dr. C. H. Mead, one of the corporators of the Mission and a Mont-Lawn speaker, and Dr. Sanford, of the North Baptist Church, who said that the chimes of Mont-Lawn were inspirational, educational, administrational and sustentational. With these four words Dr. Sanford made a capital four-minute speech on the work of Nyack. The children supply the inspiration; the teachers or helpers furnish the education; Dr. Klopsch and the superintendent are the administrators, and the countless contributors, who send the sustentations for the Home, are the administrators, or pipe lines, through which they help the children, three thousand of them every summer.

The benediction upon a Fresh Air Service held in the Bowery Mission, doubtless without a parallel in history, was pronounced by the Rev. J. F. Dickie, D.D., of the American Church in Berlin, Germany. Under the escort of Mr. Hallimond, scores of the older people inspected the kitchens, dormitory, baths, social room, free labor bureau office, and the room for the physicians, who devote an hour a day to those who come to them for treatment. The room for the men of the bread line was of special interest, because here one may get what he seeks amid clean surroundings, and often secures what he did not expect, for in the religious meetings held at 2 A.M. many a man hungry for the natural bread has found the Bread of Life as well, and gone forth into the whirl of the Bowery a new man. The Bowery Mission and the Children's Home are worthy of all confidence and should receive the hearty support of all lovers of God and men and little children.

Answered Prayers

Mrs. J. W., Ohio. "I was sick. I prayed to get well quickly, and the Lord heard and answered."

Mrs. W. B. D., Indiana. "God heard and answered my prayer to save us during some recent severe storms."

M. V., Poolesville, Indiana. "The Lord has graciously answered my prayer. I cried unto the Lord in my distress, and he heard me."

Mr. and Mrs. C. H. N., Plymouth, Mich. "We were in trouble. We went to God with it. He answered our prayers, to the joy of our souls."

Mrs. L., Ohio. "God has wonderfully answered many prayers for me. My son is restored. May the Lord restore me to a better degree of health."

K., West Virginia. "I promised the Lord if he would hear and answer my prayer, when I was in great trouble, that I would acknowledge it to the world."

B. G., Catlettsburg, Ky. "With a very thankful heart I acknowledge that God has answered my prayers many times; and I know that many of our troubles here on earth would vanish if we would only take everything to God in prayer."

Mrs. S., Pensacola, Fla. Your request for prayer has been referred to the converts' meeting of the Bowery Mission, in accordance with our usual custom. Requests for prayer cannot be printed in this column, as it is reserved for "answers to prayer" exclusively.

Ex-President Roosevelt's African Adventures

WHEN it was announced that Scribner's Magazine was to publish a series of articles by ex-President Roosevelt on his African experiences public expectation was aroused, and when the first instalment appeared there was a great demand for the October number, in which it appeared. Often when the reading public has been keyed up to a point of eager expectation over the announcement of a new book or series of articles by a famous man, it has been badly disappointed, the results being of mediocre interest. In this case, however, the first instalment was of such interest, written in such a fresh and graphic style, and dealing with a subject practically unknown to the average reader, that the articles are of even greater fascination for live men and women than was promised.

Written by a man of such prominence, the story of his African experiences would have found a comparatively large field of readers, but it must be remembered that Mr. Roosevelt was a literary man, a writer of prominence, before he was known as a factor in our political life. His Winning of the West, Hunting Trips of a Ranchman, and Naval War of 1812, the last mentioned, by the way, his first book and one that is considered an historical standard, are all written in an attractive and breezy style, characteristic of the man. His present series has an added freshness from the fact that they were written in the African bush and that even as the reader is glancing over the pages of Scribner's Mr. Roosevelt may be facing one of the "kings of beasts" and having even more thrilling adventures than he has written of, which will soon be sent on to New York that the stay-at-homes may get an insight into life and ways as different from their own as if on another planet. It is the most notable series of articles of the year.

Rural Christendom*

"PRIZE books" are not always the permanent prizes to society that their title would indicate; but Rural Christendom, the book which won the $1,000 John C. Green prize, and is issued by the American Sunday School Union, is an exception. It is full of wisdom and of suggestion. These words concerning the care of the church edifice and the training for church music, all in the important line of æsthetic improvement, should be taken to heart by every country community and many in larger places:

Children in country schools are learning drawing and music, some of the young people are attending conservatories and art schools. The church must by all means to some extent satisfy their love of the beautiful—it is the spirit of Jesus to do it—or lose her choice young people, and more and more some older people of such tastes.

There is surely no justification for the unsightly church building and its shabby surroundings. I have seen a piece of wall paper torn and hanging at loose ends for months in a country church, a large patch of the plastering down in another for a long time, shutters broken off and hanging by one hinge, a gate that stubbornly stuck in the mud half way open; other churches long crying for paint, or for repairing. Old men who are trustees may never have had æsthetic training or environment, and are insensible to the disgust and pain some of the children feel in attending such churches. And what about educated pastors from the larger towns or cities who have no eyes for such dishonor of God's house? Upon fathers and mothers there, with richer opportunities than the aged trustees, is laid the duty of beautifying the church. Very much may be done at small expense, but no expense is too great for the cure of souls, as the doctor would say no expense is too great for hospitals which are to heal bodies.

In the country how easy and inexpensive will be the grading of the church lawn, the planting of trees and flowers, the fresh paint outside, the tasteful pictures in the Sunday school room, and the general beautifying of the church! Let us be sure that everything that would offend the artistic sense of the boy or girl is removed, and we shall the more teach that there is beauty in holiness.

The singing in public worship and in the Sunday School is receiving more attention in towns and villages. We have elsewhere urged the village choral society, but here also the church has its great opportunity. There are village churches in England with wonderful singing by the congregation. It is an experience for a lifetime to visit them. The teaching of singing in the public schools and the larger number everywhere receiving private instruction gives many a small church the nucleus of trained voices for a chorus. Every winter's programme of church work should include the singing school for a term of instruction by the best teacher available. Some years ago in many parts of the country itinerant singing teachers had their round of five or six churches every week in different towns. The whole church was taught congregational singing, and what power came to the special meetings! The Gospel in song is of mighty power and it is passing strange that churches will be content, even for a month, with lifeless, incorrect and unhelpful singing.

THE OTHER SIDE OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE

An American Woman Points Out the Social and the Moral Dangers of the Movement

EDITOR CHRISTIAN HERALD: Kate Upson Clark, in an article on "The Progress of Women" in the columns of your excellent paper, says: "The idea of the great petition to Congress, signed by a million women, is excellent." She then speaks of the "injustice done to half of our adult population by depriving them of their vote."

Felix Adler said "It might be well to give women the ballot, to restrain their excessive influence." So you see one cries out for the "precious privilege," because women are not sharers in the ruling of the nations, and the other cries out for it because already the influence of the woman needs restraining.

From the days of Eden, woman has wielded her influence for good in the home, the church, and, through them, the state. When they find the business of life too pressing, or the pleasure of life too alluring, the home suffers. This is plainly seen in this day and hour. From the fashionable hotels in this great city goes up a sad, wild cry from the homeless men, though sustaining a household. Night after night, the attractive rooms of the Fifth Avenue mansions are deserted, and, although men are home lovers, they are seen sitting by the side of their much-adorned wives in the hotel cafés, with the glitter and glare that is distasteful to most men.

This comes from the present attitude of women. Since the cry has gone out, "Give us a vote!" conditions have gradually changed. Women frequent their clubs almost constantly, and shirk their home duties, often putting their children away at an early age, for some one else to "mother," as well as to educate them.

So I say to Kate Upson Clark: "Why do you not ask that a million women repledge themselves to sustain the home, and to raise the children at their own fireside, and thus fit their boys to 'purify politics,' instead of burdening the woman with the ballot?"

Some cry "taxation without representation is tyranny." We wonder at this, for they also say "equal rights for all and special privileges for none"; yet they ask for "special privilege" to the tax-paying women. This leads back to the well-tried rule of the privileged rich having more power than the poor. There is no longer any question that women can compete with men; but the question is, does that competition mean advancement for women? It is now shown that, where married women work in factories, the birth-rate decreases and the death-rate increases, which shows clearly that women are unfit for the strain. To many of the wage-earning suffragists, socialism comes first, the ballot second, and we are still "at sea" as to where Mrs. Pankhurst, their militant leader, comes in. In your editorial of November 10 you almost define her as "a woman who means to get it," if the ballot can be obtained by such disgraceful proceedings as have shocked womankind the last few weeks. She endorses all such actions and cheers them on.

We women of America wish to protest. E. R. D.

I Can Reduce Your Flesh

Would you like to reduce it by natural means and in a scientific, dignified manner?

I have reduced 25,000 women in the past seven years by a few simple directions followed in the privacy of their own rooms.

I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen stomach and heart and relieve you of such chronic ailments as rheumatism, indigestion, constipation, weak nerves, torpid liver and such difficulties as depend upon good circulation, strong nerves, strong muscles, good blood, correct breathing. You can be as good a figure as any woman of your acquaintance. Why not?

One pupil writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout! I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, my liver all clogged up and oh, dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look.

WINTER'S COMING ON

THE rustling of the leaves a-down the glade and o'er the hill,
Leaping, dancing, flying at the wind's own capering will,
Tell me summer days are ended, that the sultry
blasts are gone,
That the snow will soon be falling, for the winter's coming on.

The household gathers early from the field, the school, the town;
The old hearth, with its brightness, sheds its glory all around
Where heart, and life, and mem'ry weave their creed to early dawn,
While the howling winds around us tell us
winter's coming on.

The face of dear old mother, as she tucks the loved ones in:
Father reading, nodding, dozing, spite o' children's merry din.
Once a-bed, we're closely cuddled, o'er our heads the cover drawn,
While the frisky winds without would whisper,
"Winter's coming on."

Bragging and Praying*

THE worldly man says, "Have self-confidence; believe in yourself, if you would have men believe in you; men take you at your own measure."

Christ says, "Humble yourself if you would be exalted. Blessed are the poor in spirit, and the meek. Take the lowest place at the feast."

A reward is promised in each case. The worldly man promises worldly success; Christ, life everlasting.

Self-consciousness is undoubtedly the cause, oftener than anything else, of failures among good and intelligent people. In writing, or any other of the so-called "arts," he who most fully forgets himself in his theme or his characters is the most successful. The preacher is most efficient who thinks not of himself and how he is appearing, but of Christ crucified. The student is most successful who loses all thought of self in the studies he is pursuing.

Conversely, the most disagreeable of men is the egotist—the man whose conversation and whose correspondence are full of I's; who cannot talk with zest of anything beyond his own petty affairs; who puts his own interests always first. Such a man almost invariably feels that he and he only is right. He is incapable of a candid discussion of any subject. Self saturates his mind to such an extent that it is opaque to truth.

The subjects for prayer have been much discussed of late. Christ taught us to ask for anything which we feel that we need. The modern interpretation of this command, which is repeated over and over in the epistles of Paul, Peter, James and John, is that we should not consider that this applies to concrete worldly objects until we have exhausted every personal resource in attempting to procure them for ourselves.

"Pray for ability," say these new interpreters. "Pray to keep your health; to have the eyes of your understanding enlightened, that you may wish for the right things; that your spirit may be purified; that you may live closer to God; above all, that you may not think of yourself more highly than you ought—that you may have more of the spirit of the publican, 'Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner!'"

Says Gipsy Smith: "There are duties which, when done faithfully, are prayers"; but "cultivate the habit of prayer. Sink your own will and rights for the good of others. Remember that you are saved to serve," and the good servant places himself as the humblest of all. "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant."

"Usually, before the time of Christ," says Dr. Louis Banks, "the word 'humility' is used contemptuously and rebukingly. It meant meanness of spirit. To be humble was to be a coward. Think with what indignation men of the old school in Rome and Athens must have seen mean-spiritedness, as they called it, taken up and proclaimed as the salvation of the world! Yet it is only as we humble ourselves to burden-bearing for others that we become of the greatest usefulness to the world. Thus Sheldon Jackson, the quiet Indian missionary, was lifted to the highest dignity that his church had to give, because it esteemed him to have humbled himself the most, and served the most laboriously the cause of humanity and of his Lord. Humble, reverent, loving service glorifies common life—the beaten track becomes the highway of God. What the world needs most is Christian men and women, who with humble hearts will do every-day service. The life that stoops the lowest in service will soar the highest at the last."

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, December 12. TEXT: Luke 18: 9-14.

Crossing the River*

THE figure of a river which divides life from death is almost an inevitable one. Rivers, oftener than any other sort of barrier, have from the beginning of time formed the boundary lines between different countries.

In the classics, the River Styx must be crossed before the land of spirits could be reached. In every literature something akin to this trope occurs.

The aloofness and mystery of the land beyond a great river—the dread of the passage thither, which is likely to be perilous—and, above all, the beauty of the simile, appeal to the human heart, which, so far as history and literature reveal it to us, has been the same in all ages. Isaiah, the greatest of Hebrew poets, uses it often. He speaks, as he rises in some flight of imagination, not only of the river, but of its surroundings—the willows that grow along its banks; the blossoms which spring wherever its quickening waters flow; the peace which is suggested by its smooth surface and irresistible progress; the way in which rivers open a way in the mountains, thus guiding the pathway of the traveler; while his worst anathema upon a land is that its rivers shall be dried up and made a wilderness.

The fear of death used to be far greater than now. Jonathan Edwards and his contemporaries probably raised this fear to a higher pitch than it has ever reached, before or since. They saw most clearly the severe and just side of the Almighty. To them he was Jehovah the Terrible.

To us he is not made to appear in that light. Perhaps we dwell too much upon the loving and merciful characteristics of our Father. But, however that may be, it is certain that the terrors of a future life are seldom presented in these days; and that the fear of death has proportionately decreased.

Long years ago, the greatest English poet pictured, as no one else has ever done, the immemorial human shrinking from death:

> Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
> This sensible warm motion to become
> A kneaded clod; and the delighted spirit
> To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside
> In thrilling regions of thick-ribbéd ice;
> To be imprisoned in the viewless winds,
> And blown with restless violence round about
> The pendant world; . . . 'tis too horrible.
> The weariest and most loathéd worldly life
> That age, ache, penury and imprisonment
> Can lay on nature, is a paradise
> To what we fear of death.

Christ's especial mission, "to bring life and immortality to light," has been emphasized by our great preachers and teachers until this instinctive horror has been minimized. Even the physical recoil from death has abated, so that the figure of Christian, frightened and slipping in the dark waters, and drowning but for the aid of his friend, Hopeful, is no longer universally applicable.

Many reasons enter into this change besides those which have been mentioned. Not only the trust in God's mercy, developed among twentieth-century Christians as never before, has assisted to this end, but also the deeper understanding of his purposes, which profound study and philosophical deduction have brought forth. Men recognize the justice in the idea that cross and crown should go together—that "the light affliction" really does work "an eternal weight of glory"—as Christian's wonderful progress figures for us in the beautiful old allegory which we have been studying.

But if, as with Christian, fear and trembling attack you as you descend into the swift river, fear not; for as the Shining Ones bade him to go forward in faith, so shall helpers surround you in the dark hour. "His song shall come to thy sigh; his glory to thy grief."

We Don't Want You to Buy This Book Until You Have Seen It!

Of all new things the newest is "HEART SONGS," companion volume to the world-famous "HEART THROBS," and yet it contains some of the oldest things in the world---the Good Old Favorite Songs and Melodies That Will Never Die! We haven't space to list its Four Hundred Titles, but one thing is sure—That the Old Song You've Almost Forgotten is There, Words and Music, to open up again the floodgates of memory.

Don't Rack Your Brain or Worry About Christmas Presents When it's so Easy to Get "Heart Songs"

What the People Who Have Bought "Heart Songs" Say:

These rare selections can spring from nothing short of soul depth. I hope they will spread as far as books can be made known.—Guy Brink Morse, Minneapolis, Minn.

Heart Songs received. I would say that I am very much pleased with same. I expect many hours of pleasure in reviewing some of the songs I hummed as a boy, forty to forty-five years ago. Heart Songs should be in all homes.—E. G. Reid, Boston, Mass.

Why do I like Heart Songs? Because there are songs in it that my grandfather used to sing—songs that I used to sing when a child with my father. My father had one of the sweetest voices I ever heard and I cannot keep the tears from falling when I hear the old songs.—Mrs. M. Hubbard Fielhouse, Elkhart, Ind.

I think it is a grand book; a fine collection of dear old songs and hymns. Some are among the first I learned to sing, and some we used to sing in Sabbath School and in the schoolhouse. I think it is all we could desire in such a book, and I think they will make ideal Christmas presents.—Mrs. A. T. Teary, Ironton, Wis.

I received the copy of Heart Songs and last night spent a good portion of the evening going through it. It is a treasure. I want to give a number of these for Christmas presents and will send you a list of names before a great while. I will ask that you do me a special favor and autograph each one of them.—S. C. Dobbs, Atlanta, Ga.

I cannot tell how much I appreciate the copy of Heart Songs I just received. I have glanced through it, and am certainly delighted to know that at last there is a book, wherein one can practically find all the favorites, and in such a substantial form, too. As a friend and a Canadian I thank you for gathering this magnificent collection of gems. Louis F. Schwartz, Literary Editor, The Berlin Daily Telegragh, Berlin, Ont.

Heart Songs, which must take its place in American musical literature, and which I prize most highly, is now with me, to hold and to keep. Do you have time to think how many households are speaking in praise and thankfulness to you for the beautiful result of your patient, persistent, high minded, extensive research and labor, real labor, in giving us our favorite songs in this most valuable collection under one cover? Now we have the dear old songs at hand. Books and books there may be, but only one Heart Songs. Being a young enthusiast during the Civil War, there is no group of songs to fit all states of mind, in my view, as the war songs.—Mrs. Louise M. Stewart, Somerville, Mass.

"Most Gratefully I Thank You"

I have just had a most remarkable experience, an experience that comes to one very, very seldom in life, one I would not have believed possible, an experience I would not have missed for anything in the world. It came about in a very simple way. I picked up a volume of Heart Songs, opened it at random and glanced at the title of the music before me; at once I was transported down the vista of years gone by; I saw a little boy seated upon a low stool beside a piano, upon which a young girl was playing. Standing at her side was a young man, singing the song which was on the page before me. An open fire shed its subdued light upon the face of the young man, as he poured out his soul in song, and upon the young girl as her heart throbbed to the words of "Love's Old Sweet Song," and the boy looked on in a sort of wonder and amazement, not understanding what it was all about, but enthralled in the tenseness of the moment and swept away on the waves of music, out of himself into the regions—oh, so beautiful—of harmonious song; not knowing that at that moment was being born within him a glorious love of music, than which there is no greater love save the love of God.

I turn to another page and, again I am transformed; my little drowsy head lies on my mother's breast and I hear again the soft tones of her voice, long silent, crooning the familiar notes of "Old Black Joe," and again in imagination I drop deep into the quiet slumber of weary childhood.

Scene after scene passes before me as I turn the leaves, feeling after feeling that I supposed long dead comes to me again. My whole life passes in review before me. I am happy, I am sad, I pass from land to sea, from mountain to fertile valley; I am in the North—I am in the South: I hear the harmony of the guitar and banjo, the blare of the horn and the drone of the viol: the song of the soldier, the song of the lover, the song of the sunshine and rain, the song of the wind and the beat of the storm, the song of the summer and winter, the song of the old and young, the song of life, death and the hereafter—a great peace descends upon me, a great joy wells up in my heart, for I have communed with "Sweet Dreamland Faces," I have lived again my life, with all its gladness and sorrow; I have met again my friends, long departed or forgotten; I have seen where their lives have touched mine, either for good or evil; I have seen that the smallest of things are often the greatest of things, that nothing is lost but all is gained.

I believe that one of the closest of communions in the world is the communion of souls in song; then it is that we are one; all differences, all pettinesses are forgotten, and we are one and in the great harmonious whole we are nearer to God and the millennium than at any other time.

Most gratefully I thank you for this book of experiences and for the glorious reading between the lines which it has made possible.—Robert W. Guiler, M.D., Newton Highlands, Mass.

A Musical Romance and Wedding from "Heart Songs"

A good suggestion for an interesting evening's entertainment, whether in the home or at a church function, has been sent to us by an admirer of the Heart Songs book, who says that this plan has been tried with most excellent results.

The idea is to announce a "Musical Romance and Wedding from Heart Songs," and the story is unfolded by asking twenty-five questions, and as they are asked a familiar air is played from the Heart Songs book, on the piano, the title of which is the answer to question just asked. Slips of paper having been distributed, numbered from 1 to 25, the participants are requested to write the title of the piece as they hear it, after the question has been read by the "announcer." Additional interest is awakened when the "announcer" fills in the time with jocular remarks and byplay regarding the events that are transpiring, but care must be taken that the title of the piece is not given away in these remarks. Participants are privileged to hum the air if they know it, but in no case must they speak any of the words of the title or song.

When the list of twenty-five questions is finished, the quickest way to decide on the prize winner is to read the questions again, following each by the song title which is the answer. The players check off all correct answers on their papers, and the person having all the replies correct is the prize winner; or, failing an entire set of correct replies, the player who has the greatest number wins the prize. It adds to the pleasure of the game if all join in singing the answer to the final question, "America."

The List of Questions is as Follows:

1. What was her name? "Sweet Alice, Ben Bolt."
2. What was his name? "Captain Jinks."
3. Where were they both born? "Dixie."
4. Where did they first meet? "Comin' Through the Rye."
5. What was she singing? "Love's Old Sweet Song."
6. What was he singing? "Alice, Where Art Thou?"
7. What did he finally bid her? "A Soldier's Farewell."
8. Where did he go? "Marching Through Georgia."
9. Where did he spend his nights? "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground."
10. What did the band play when he returned? "When Johnny Comes Marching Home."
11. Where were they married? "Old Kentucky Home."
12. Who was her maid of honor? "Annie Laurie."
13. Who was best man? "Robin Adair."
14. Who played the wedding march? "Old Dan Tucker."
15. What did he give her? "The Last Rose of Summer."
16. What did he tie it with? "The Lost Chord."
17. After the ceremony, what did they hear? "Jingle, Bells!"
18. What did the ushers sing to the bridesmaids? "Good-night, Ladies."
19. Where did the couple go on their honeymoon? "Maryland, My Maryland."
20. Who did they think about most while away? "The Old Folks at Home."
21. Who met them at the station when they returned? "Old Black Joe."
22. When she was thirsty, what did her husband say? "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes."
23. What did she bring him? "The Old Oaken Bucket."
24. What did they both love most? "Home, Sweet Home."
25. Where did they always stay? "America."

What the New York Times Says About "Heart Songs":

"Probably we may find as fair a test of the ordinary American musical taste as can be found anywhere in a new collection of old music—Heart Songs, published by the Chapple Publishing Company, in Boston. Mr. Chapple's National Magazine offered prizes for songs full of heart interest, songs dear to the people. Contributions were received for four years. There were more than 20,000 contributors, mostly Americans. The result is a book designed as a companion to 'Heart Throbs,' previously published by Mr. Chapple, a selection of prose and verse commended by a multitude of readers.

"As might have been expected, the book contains nearly all the favorites of an earlier and less sophisticated generation. Old, yellowed sheets of music published 'before the war,' and the songs of the war itself; love songs and college songs, and the hymns that are dear to a plain people were sent in by the competitors. Yet the proportion of music that is really good music is not small. The 'Tannhauser' song of the 'Evening Star' is sandwiched between Raymond's 'Take Me Home' and George Cooper's 'Sweet Genevieve.' The classics of popular song, from 'The Campbells Are Coming' and 'Annie Laurie,' the folk songs that have withstood a sea change, the persistent airs of Michael William Balfe, are as inevitably in such a book as Stephen Foster's once-familiar tunes, and the old American love songs of the 'Bonny Eloise' and 'Juanita' type. Nobody would expect to miss here, of course, a single song of Franz Abt. They are all in evidence, including 'When the Swallows Homeward Fly.' But Handel's 'Angels Ever Bright and Fair,' Mendelssohn's 'I Would That My Love,' Schubert's 'Sylvia' and the familiar setting of Ben Jonson's 'Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes' are music of a different quality, music that no cultivation of the ear and the mind can ever banish to obscurity. Of course, we have the 'Lohengrin' bridal chorus, and Verdi's 'Trovatore' melodies, with adapted words. They are surely among the popular songs. Sullivan, too, is largely represented, while the patriotic songs, the national hymns of various countries, the real darky songs and the imitations of black minstrelsy's palmy days are all here.

"There has been no attempt whatever at arrangement or classification. That was found impracticable. One may pick up the book at random and surely encounter an old friend by merely turning the page. Words and music alike are given, and it would be difficult to say what has been omitted. The range is large in date and quality. There are melodies whose origins are forgotten. There are songs of the present hour by Victor Herbert, 'Yankee Doodle' and 'The Star-Spangled Banner.' 'Kathleen Mavourneen' and 'Bohunkus' jostle each other, with the 'Erminie' lullaby, 'When the Springtime Comes, Gentle Annie' and 'I Lost My Money on a Bobtail Nag' close at hand. 'Barbara Allen' and 'Believe Me, If All Those Endearing Young Charms, are side by side. The book has a positive historical value."—New York Times, October 30, 1909.

American Boy

Biggest, brightest and best magazine for boys in all the world. You need never worry about your boy's company when he is chumming with The American Boy. It is the greatest adjunct to refined home training. Wins every boy's confidence and enthusiasm. Bright, breezy stories of adventure, travel, history, biography and world events, beautifully illustrated. Proper amount of sports and games, and practical departments of photography, electricity, stamps, curios, carpentry, mechanics, how to do things, how to make things. Is doing more for the healthy entertainment and uplift of boys than any other single influence. Has the enthusiastic support of over 250,000 boys, and their parents. Give your boy a magazine of his own.

American Magazine

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is fortunate to be able to secure The American Magazine this year on the same special terms as in previous years, because its price has been raised to 15 cents a copy, and $1.50 a year.

This increase is necessary because of the addition of forty more pages of reading matter and pictures, making the magazine bigger, better, brighter, livelier, more joyous than ever. The three most important features appearing in any magazine this year are in The American Magazine: "What Woman Has Done in America," by Ida M. Tarbell, a historical series lavishly illustrated. "Simon, the Jester," a fascinating novel by William J. Locke, author of "Simple Septimus." "Barbarous Mexico," a startling series on slavery and other amazing conditions in Mexico, by J. K. Turner. Many other extraordinary features will appear in The American Magazine for 1910.

Cosmopolitan

Cosmopolitan Magazine is the one great magazine of all the great national monthlies. No matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1910 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by George Randolph Chester, or the intensely interesting adventure story by E. Phillips Oppenheim. "The best, no matter what it costs" is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

Good Housekeeping Magazine is a richly illustrated monthly, the one magazine which has popularized household science and home-making in a broad sense. It is the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest and most refreshing of periodicals for general reading, its fiction and discussions of current issues being particularly good. It is an all-around family magazine, which renders home-making a pleasure. How to secure the most and the best for the money in home furnishing and equipment, and in food supply, is among its specialties. Its greatly enlarged Household Experiment Station, Model Kitchen and Testing Room of household appliances is a national institution. Special attention is given to health, to children, to needlework, and stenciling.

Harper's Bazar

Beginning with the Christmas number of 1909, Harper's Bazar goes into its superb new, enlarged and improved form. It will be bigger than ever before. It will be better than ever before. It will be more interesting than ever before. It will be more helpful than ever before. It will be indispensable to every thoughtful woman whose ambition is to make the most of life for herself and for her family. It will "set the fashion." It will continue to be the supreme authority on questions of good form, household decoration, entertainment and domestic topics of every kind. It will have the best short stories, the best pictures, the best essays, the best poems found in any woman's magazine.

NOTE—The descriptive matter on this page concerning the above magazines is supplied by their respective publishers for the information of our readers.

For Home Reading or for Holiday Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A beautifully illustrated monthly magazine for children from three to thirteen. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and, above all, true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also playwork for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

Mr. S. S. McClure, editor of McClure's Magazine, is one of the greatest magazine editors in America and a man of national reputation. Speaking of McClure's Magazine, he said recently: "I shall continue to spend more and more money—to give my readers a better and better magazine. McClure's Magazine for the next year will be more intensely interesting, and will exert a more potent influence on American life than any other magazine. It will be the best twelve numbers of any magazine in America." McClure's is always a step in advance of other magazines. Besides the articles on government, politics, people and things, McClure's is also famous for its fiction. The coming numbers will make new history for McClure's. You'll want them surely.

Pearson's Magazine

One-half is for information on subjects in which you are interested; that means home subjects, the things that American people are thinking and talking about. Once in a while some foreign matter may be discussed, but only in its relation to Americans and only when it means something to America. During the coming year informative articles on subjects which mean something to the average man will be written, in every case by the writer best qualified for the matter. The other half of the magazine is for entertainment, purely and simply. Pearson's Magazine is famous in two hemispheres for its fiction. It gets the best that is written. There is a continual and urgent demand from the newspapers for Pearson's stories. Do you want this sort of a magazine?

Review of Reviews

Fifty Magazines Condensed—More Necessary Than Ever.

In a single number of The Review of Reviews there are sixty topics, every one of real, immediate interest to every intelligent man and woman, discussed and interpreted by Dr. Albert Shaw, his staff, and his contributors; there are one hundred pictures that really illustrate and inform, including the cartoon department, which amuses into the bargain; there are fifty magazines and leading articles skilfully condensed, and scores of the new books reviewed. "The Review of Reviews is a liberal education," is the way one eminent subscriber sums it up. The more things that happen—the more magazines there are—the more indispensable is The Review of Reviews. Busy men and women want it, need it, read it. Why not you?

Woman's Home Companion

The greater Woman's Home Companion will be the most interesting, the most useful and the most beautiful woman's magazine published. There will be fiction by Anna Katherine Green, Juliet Wilhur Tompkins, Anne Warner, Myra Kelly, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and a host of others. There will be special articles no woman will want to miss. With nearly a score of different practical departments for women Woman's Home Companion can promise the most useful woman's magazine in the world. In short, The Companion will have more stories than the fiction magazines, more pictures than the picture magazines, and more practical departments than any other magazine.

World Evangel

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are Sunday School teachers or scholars should not fail to include The World Evangel in their combination magazine orders. The Evangel is the leading Sunday School magazine. It makes teaching delightful and effective, its fund of anecdotes enabling the teacher to interest scholars of all grades. Its lesson study department provides the best available exposition and information, and its lesson-teaching department is divided into Adult, Intermediate and Primary Departments, ineluding comment on Primary Graded Lessons. The Superintendent's Department is most practical. In addition to the lesson comment, by six specialists, it presents the most successful methods and news. The Evangel will save time and increase your efficiency.

World To-day (The)

The one magazine indispensable to every home. A world review, furnishing monthly not only a complete digest of events, but many attractive articles on timely subjects, by noted contributors. In it you will find events, religion, travel, science, invention, art, drama, literature, education, etc., treated in a popular way, affording recreation for the idle hour, and, best of all, something worth while. In illustration it is a regular panorama of the world—many of the pictures being in colors. The World To-Day is really a $3 magazine for but $1.50. It is clean, healthful and inspiring—just right for Christian readers. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain. It has proven one of our most popular publieations, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

CHRISTMAS DAYS IN WASHINGTON

By WALDON FAWCETT

IN no American community is there a more enthusiastic observance of Christmas than at the national capital, and the Yule-tide of 1909 promises to be especially notable in this respect. One explanation of this is found in the fact that a new President has been inaugurated and a new household installed at the White House since the last season of merriment and good-will. Coincident with this change in the head of the administration has been the arrival of new occupants for Cabinet and lesser positions, and for the diplomatic posts at the Yankee seat of government. With the zest of a new experience for many of the participants, and the novelty of new faces in a new environment, it is but natural that the December holidays of the present year should promise an old-fashioned American Christmas in the city that ought to be representative of the best American ideas and ideals.

Furthermore, in favor of a rousing Christmas at Uncle Sam's headquarters this year is the circumstance that there are many children—an unusual number in fact—in the official community as at present constituted. At the nation's capital, as elsewhere, the inspiration and co-operation of young people is essential to the full realization of Christmas possibilities, and there have been periods in the history of the nation when this light-hearted element was conspicuously absent in the higher official circles. The Taft régime, however, is blessed with the presence in the White House of a trio of typical American young people, and, in a majority of the Cabinet households, there are young people who, though past the Santa Claus age, have enough youthful spirit to infuse the Christmas programme with all the requisite jollity.

Just here it may be explained that there is no official programme for Christmas at the national capital. This is in marked contrast to almost every other holiday on the calendar. On Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, Fourth of July and Thanksgiving there are formal programmes of greater or less significance, in which the President of the United States and other prominent public officials are conspicuous participants; but always within recent years it has been the custom to recognize Christmas as a home and family holiday. There are, to be sure, services in some of the churches, including the services at midnight on Christmas Eve, and there is not a little Christmas calling among the Latin-American young people in the diplomatic circle, but there is nothing approaching a set routine to take officials from their own firesides on this red-letter day.

Throughout the United States there is a general disposition to regard Christmas as the pre-eminent occasion of the year for family reunions, but nowhere is this sentiment more marked than in the city on the Potomac. The explanation is not far to seek. The members of almost every family in the higher official circle of the nation are scattered during the major portion of the year. In many instances, Cabinet members or other officials, when they take office in Washington, leave their children in school in the community where they have grown up. Or, if the children are older, they are in preparatory schools or colleges. So likewise is the average official in Washington separated from his brothers and sisters and other kith and kin who have presumably remained in that section of the country where is located the family hold, while one member of the clan has been summoned to official preferment in Washington. With such a situation it is but natural that the average official in Uncle Sam's service should seize upon Christmas as the ideal time for a long-awaited family reunion. Some of the moulders of the nation's destiny prefer, to be sure, to return to their old homes for Christmas, but the number is overshadowed by those who make their Washington residences rallying points for out-of-town relatives. Moreover, Washington is, climatically and otherwise, a most attractive place to spend the midwinter holidays. Its southern location makes a "green Christmas" of much more frequent occurrence than the proverbially appropriate "white Christmas," but there are compensations, even though snow be denied, and there have been Christmases in history when all the capital a-sleighing went on historic Pennsylvania Avenue.

The Famous Dining-Room at the White House
Where the Christmas Dinner is always served

The idea of the family reunion at Christmas, as cherished in officialdom, is well exemplified by the present situation with reference to the White House family. None of the three children of the President and Mrs. Taft have been able to spend much time with their parents for some months past, but it is planned to have them all home at Christmas. Mr. Robert, the eldest son, comes from Yale College; Miss Helen, the only daughter, journeys from Philadelphia, where she is attending Bryn Mawr College, and Charlie, the youngest and literally the life of the family, especially at Christmas, comes home from his uncle's private school in Connecticut.

At the ordinary vacation season the Taft young people are wont to bring home school chums as house guests, but it is a question

GOD'S UNSPEAKABLE GIFT

A CHRISTMAS SERMON

By Robert Stuart MacArthur

Minister at Calvary Church since 1870

TEXT—II. COR. 9 : 15

"Thanks be to God for his unspeakable Gift."

ALL things are now ready for the greatest event the world has ever known—the birth of Jesus Christ. John the Baptist, the divinely appointed forerunner, has come; the time fixed upon in the counsels of eternity is approaching. Hitherto there had been the twilight of revelation, but now the rising of the sun is near. The question is often asked, if Christ was to inaugurate a new kingdom, why did he not come to earth sooner for that purpose? This objection was urged by Celsus, the assailant of Christianity in the second century. There is a real sense in which human limitations also limit God. God can reveal himself to men only as men are capable of receiving the divine revelation. God must speak to men as men, and not to men as angels. God could establish his kingdom in the world only when the world was ready to receive that kingdom. He is a God of order and of law, as well as of love. The birth of Christ is the central point of all history. It marked the close of one era and the opening of another era.

All history before Christ's coming was a preparation for that coming; and all history since is the expansion and declaration of the meaning of his advent. Three nations especially contributed toward the world's preparation for the coming of Christ—the Jews, the Greeks and the Romans. There were three cities of special importance in that day in the history of the world—Jerusalem, Athens, and Rome. The Jews stood for religion, the Greeks for culture, and the Romans for law and organization. Not only the festivals and sacrifices of the Hebrews, but their literature, business, and wars had a sacred character. Culture was the great characteristic of the Greeks; their intellect revealed itself in art, literature, and philosophy. But Greece was sunken in moral corruption. Her cry, almost unconscious to herself, was for a "Healer." Rome was the road-builder and the unifier of the world. Her emperor was deified; her people were enslaved. The successive empires of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, and Macedonia, made the world ready for the Roman yoke. Rome's idea of universal empire was now virtually realized. From Britain to the Indies, and from the Caspian to the Canaries, Rome was master. But corruption festered in every rank of life. Rome's cry was for a Deliverer. Thus Hebraism furnished a positive, and Gentilism a negative preparation for the coming of the Messiah. The fulness of time was marked by a very general opinion among both Jews and Gentiles, that the coming One was near at hand. This expectation was a striking characteristic of the Augustan period of Rome.

Thus the "fulness of time" had now come; the process of preparation was now finished; and the greatest event in history is about to be accomplished. God is now, according to promise and prophecy, to send forth his Son. The gates of Janus were now closed, and peace brooded over the world. It was a fitting time for the birth of the Prince of Peace.

> No war, or battle's sound
> Was heard the world around;
> The idle spear and shield were high uphung,
> The hooked chariot stood
> Unstained with hostile blood.

When stillness was brooding over the world, the glorious song of the angels was heard over the plains of Bethlehem, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." In the birth of Christ the dying forces of these three ancient nations had new birth. Christ was "the desire of all nations;" "all things were created by him and for him." It was a great idea of Dionysius the Little, an abbot at Rome, in the year A.D. 526, when he dated our era from the birth of Christ. In that birth God gave the world his choicest gift.

Some persons suppose that the apostle Paul, in the text, is speaking only of the charitable disposition which these Corinthian Christians had shown in sending aid to needy saints. This interpretation falls far short of the apostle's deep meaning. The language which he employs is too strong and fervent to be applied to any gift short of Christ as God's supreme and inimitable gift to the human race. The reference is doubtless to this Unspeakable Gift. This mode of speech is emphatically Pauline. Paul's soul was so filled with Christ, that he cannot long discuss any subject without being led to speak of Christ as the loftiest theme of mind and heart. He was always so full of Christ, that all subjects naturally led him to speak of the name and love of his Lord and Saviour.

Often while moving calmly along in a line of logical argument, he "goes off at a word," and pours out his soul in an attempt to describe the depth, height, and breadth of the love of God in Jesus Christ. Thus he bursts forth in Romans 11:33, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God; how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past tracing out!" In the text, he is led from his appreciation of the benefactions of God's people, to speak of the invaluable gift of Christ himself. Consideration of these lesser gifts led him up to God's love in bestowing his Unspeakable Gift. It is quite certain, therefore, that the apostle's mind is on the great gift of redemption, with its glorious results and with its divine Redeemer. All the gifts of this Christmas season ought to lead our hearts past all human love to Christ, God's Unspeakable Gift to men.

The uniform representation of Scripture is that Christ is the gift of God for the salvation of men. In that wondrous and sublime verse, John 3:16, this truth is distinctly taught. Here we are assured that Christ is the gift of the Father's eternal and infinite love for the salvation of a dying world. Luther rightly called this verse "The Bible in miniature." It is difficult to find elsewhere, even in the Bible, words which so fully express the moving cause of redemption, through the eternal love of God, as that truth is declared in this matchless Scripture. If the entire Bible were destroyed, with the exception of this verse, there is truth enough therein, if fully believed, to save the human race. The effect of God's eternal love was the gift of his only begotten Son. This Son was given up to shameful humiliation, and, finally, to the death of the cross. There could be no fuller manifestation of God's love than this gift.

In Gal. 1:14 we have the words, "Who gave himself for our sins." Here the same truth is taught as to God's love in giving his Son for our redemption. Christ was the great sacrifice which both the love and justice of God required on our behalf. He came not only to redeem us from the curse of the law, but to deliver us from this present evil world, and to bring us off more than conquerors, through his mighty love. It would be easy to cite numerous other passages, emphasizing this same truth. It is taught in the strongest possible words by the apostle Paul, and other inspired writers of the New Testament.

Doubtless it is true, in a sense, as many theologians have affirmed, that man has no claim on God for salvation. We could not compel God to provide the means for our redemption. The selection of Christ as Saviour is an undeserved gift of God to our race. But, in a larger and fuller sense, God being a God of love, this gift was natural on his part, and was, in some sense, deserved on our part. Lost men, by their terrible condition, because God is love, had some claim upon God's compassion. Love must express itself in practical forms. God longed to reveal, in time, his love in eternity. The gift of Christ was a fuller manifestation of God's wisdom and love than was the creation of the universe. When the world was created, the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy; but when Christ was born, angels chanted the sweetest song which ever came from heaven to earth.

God would not be God, if he did not love. The sun is not the sun, if it never shines. A stream is not a stream, if it never flows. Shining and flowing are inseparable attributes of suns and streams. We repeat, God would cease to be God, if he ceased to love, for "God is love." God is not simply loving, but he is love itself. Love is his heart, his soul, his life. The Dead Sea is dead, because it ever receives and never bestows. It is calculated that six million tons of water fall into the Dead Sea whether they can extend such hospitality at Christmas. Commodious as the White House is, its capacity will be taxed if Mrs. Taft's health permits a general family reunion. The President and Mrs. Taft have a number of brothers, sisters, nieces and nephews, and being naturally clannish they would enjoy nothing more than to pursue in the White House the time-honored custom of having all members of the family reunited at Christmas time.

The touch of the spectacular in Christmas observance at the national capital is found in the celebration of the day in what is known as our official foreign colony—that is, the section of residential Washington made up of the envoys or accredited agents of foreign governments, together with their families and the households of the secretaries.

The foreigners celebrate Christmas in accordance with the customs and traditions of their various countries, and naturally the festivities are variegated in character. Some of the diplomatic households, to be sure, have adopted the American Christmas, and oddly enough there are represented in this category the delegates from that supposedly least progressive of nations, China. Many of the children of the Chinese diplomats attend American schools and have naturally imbibed American theories as to Christmas. A pioneer in this Chinese adoption of the American Christmas is Mr. Yung Kwai, of the Chinese Legation, who has an American wife, and a house full of children who speak English and Chinese with equal ease. Mr. Yung Kwai has been delegated by the Chinese government to have general charge of the scores of Chinese boys of prominent families who have lately been sent to this country to be educated, and it is his ambition to have all these lads assemble each Christmas for a sort of national reunion at the Chinese Legation in Washington.

The children of the diplomats from South and Central America show allegiance to the customs of their native lands by attending church at midnight on Christmas Eve, and afterward formally unveiling in each home a miniature representation of the city of Bethlehem, the most conspicuous place in which is occupied by a grotto, in which are tiny figures of the infant Jesus, Mary and Joseph, together with the three Wise Men.

The French Embassy is the scene of a great Chrismas frolic, the keynote of which is the distribution of presents from three Christmas trees, ranged in a row. There is always a Christmas tree at the German Embassy, and the British Ambassador entertains his official staff and their families at an old-fashioned English Christmas dinner.

GOD'S UNSPEAKABLE GIFT

daily from the Jordan, and from various smaller mountain streams which flow into that sea. The whole of this amount of water is carried off by evaporation. The Dead Sea has no outlet, visible or invisible. In the nature of the case, it cannot have an outlet, as it is the lowest body of water on the globe.

It used to be supposed that in its centre was a great abyss, into which the Jordan poured its full tide of water; but many modern explorers, and among them Lieutenant Lynch of the United States Navy, who, in 1848, passed down the Jordan from the Sea of Galilee, and made many soundings of the Sea, entirely exploded these superstitions. Love which never bestows is not love. In this deep and lofty sense, the gift of Christ by God was natural on his part, and was to be expected on our part. Christ is God's supreme exhibition of eternal and infinite love. In creation God showed his hand; in redemption he revealed his heart. More even the omnipotent God could not do for the salvation of men. Christ is God's utmost exhibition of love. We may, with deepest reverence, say that in this Unspeakable Gift, God, the Omnipotent One, exhausted himself.

A very remarkable word is this which is translated unspeakable. It is found nowhere else in the New Testament; this fact alone is deeply significant. The apostle Paul really coined this word, in his consuming desire to express an inexpressible thought. The writer's thought, therefore, is that there is no adequate exegesis of this wonderful Gift of God to men. There is here a continent of truth and love so vast, that no guide can explore it in all its extent. Guides may traverse this vast domain, and discover much on either side of their journey; but after all their discoveries there will be still great domains of truth untraversed. Doubtless, even all our studies in eternity will never exhaust the realms and mines of God's limitless love.

The Unspeakable Gift—this Gift is unspeakable, because of the inexpressible greatness of the love which it reveals. It manifests the eternal love of God; it equally evinces the inexpressible love of Christ. If we stand at the cradle or the cross, and go backward in thought to the time when Christ was in the bosom of the Father, we shall lose ourselves in this limitless domain of love. If we think forward to the grandeur of the throne, we shall be equally lost in the majesty and glory of the love of God in the gift of Christ. This love ennobles the humility of Christ's birth. The world scorned and despised humility, making this noble grace synonymous with ignoble meanness.

Christ's unspeakable love made humility a queen among the virtues, and robed her in resplendent garments. Christ inserted himself into the race at its lowest and weakest point. He might have come into the world a full-grown man, as did the first Adam; he chose to come a helpless babe. He might have come with all the splendor and glory of royalty; he chose to come in poverty as the reputed child of a carpenter. He thus glorified childhood and dignified poverty. As a peasant's child, lying in a manger of an Eastern khan, he forever rebuked pride, and put the crown of glory on the brow of self-sacrificing love.

The Unspeakable Gift—it is a remarkably interesting and inspiring thought that God's Unspeakable Gift was a child. When God would give the race the sublimest exhibition of divine and eternal love, he gave us a holy child. No classic poet or philosopher ever conceived this lofty thought regarding childhood. It is a unique idea that God's Unspeakable Gift was a little child. In a real sense every child is a holy gift from God for Christ's sake. Christmas is peculiarly the child's festival. No one can ever estimate the joy that has come to childhood because of this festival, and because of its exaltation of motherhood and babyhood. Childhood is glorified because Christ was a child. Every boy is ennobled because Jesus was once a boy of his own age. Every mother may now be a Madonna.

The Unspeakable Gift—this thought is also taught in the inexpressible benefits which result from Christ's perfect life and atoning death. Christ's life is revolutionizing the world. It has changed the philosophy of the centuries. His words have controlled the literature of the ages. Christ's life is a great civilizing agency even in the twentieth century. His spirit has sent the missionaries into the darkest corners of the earth.

We shall never know the full meaning of his life and death until we stand before the great white throne and see the innumerable hosts of the redeemed of every tongue and nation, which have come out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. When we hear them chanting in loftiest strains, saying, "Salvation unto our God who sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb. . . . . Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God forever and ever, Amen," we shall more fully know the meaning of Christ's redemptive love.

In this Gift we have God's inexpressible love. The length, breadth, depth, and height of this love we can never fully know. It is still true, as the apostle Paul has told us, that it passeth knowledge. In the presence of this Gift we may well ask each one, "What doth the Lord require of thee?" Is it not God's first requirement that we shall accept Jesus Christ as personal Saviour and Lord? This is our first duty toward Jesus Christ. We should follow the example of the Magi, and lay our treasures of wealth, learning, and love at his feet. We are verily guilty if we withhold from him the supreme love of our deepest hearts. The holy Birth in Bethlehem will have been spiritually in vain for us, if the Christ be not born in our hearts.

Like the shepherds, we should not only receive this truth for ourselves, but we should hasten to tell others the blessed tidings of the Saviour's birth. The stream of our gratitude should flow out from our own full hearts in a tide of mercy, bearing the blessings of salvation to our fellow-men. We do not truly love Christ, until that love flows out in blessings to others. There will be times, also, when like Mary we shall wish to keep all these blessed truths and ponder them in our hearts. But out of this pondering should come practical service for the salvation of others.

Once more at the Christmastide, let our hearts overflow with songs of glory to God in the highest, of peace and good will to men, while our hands open in gifts to the needy, and our lives are reconsecrated in grateful love to him who is God's Unspeakable Gift. Thus shall we best show our love to God by loving deeds to men.

She Saved Twelve Thousand Girls

The Remarkable Spiritual Lifework of Elizabeth S. Hurley, "Angel of Sympathy and Mercy"

By KATE UPSON CLARK

AMID the depressing array of the daily news of sin and crime it is like a fresh, reviving breeze from heaven to read of a long life successfully devoted to the saving of souls—a blameless, modest, noble life—unknown to fame, as worldly fame goes, but written high in the book of the recording angel.

Such a life was that of Elizabeth S. Hurley, superintendent of the Elizabeth Home for Girls, at 307 East Twelfth Street, New York City. It is computed by C. Loring Brace, secretary of the Children's Aid Society (with which the Elizabeth Home is affiliated), that the loving and unselfish labors of Mrs. Hurley rescued twelve thousand girls, and gave them to the world as useful and consecrated workers in the Master's vineyard.

Mrs. Hurley was born on January 1, 1827, in New Brunswick, Canada, of deeply religious parents. Her father, Joseph Spratt, was a lay preacher in the Methodist denomination, and founded the first Methodist church in his town.

Elizabeth received the usual education of Canadian girls in the middle of the last century. and taught for some time in a private school near her home before coming to New York. But in 1855 we find her teaching in a mission school, under the auspices of the Children's Aid Society, on "Dutch Hill," on the East Side of New York City, near Fortieth Street—a section at that time accounted one of the filthiest and most hopeless in New York.

Refined, intellectual, gifted with a fine singing voice and unusual musical taste, dainty almost to fastidiousness in her personal habits, the young Canadian girl, then less than twenty years of age, threw herself with all her heart into the work of reclaiming the children of this abandoned district.

"To every unfortunate family for miles around," says Mr. Brace, "she was an angel of mercy and sympathy. She lived in and for her poor. Her only relaxation was her weekly trip to Brooklyn to hear Beecher; and yet she dearly loved books, her favorite reading being a translation of Plato."

The children under her charge became passionately attached to her. She married Dr. Hurley when quite young, but he went to the war and was killed in battle; so that, after two happy years with him, she again devoted her entire time and strength to her charitable work. Practically fifty-five years of her life were given by this noble woman to tireless labor among the poor.

In 1892 the Elizabeth Home for Girls, in memory of Elizabeth D. Wheeler, was erected by her family, and Mrs. Hurley became its matron. Valuable as her work had been among the wretched squatters of "Dutch Hill," it became now even more useful, because concentrated upon a single class, and that a class vitally needing help and direction.

Of Mrs. Hurley's peculiar tact and charm in dealing with girls her associates cannot say too much. Once, when she was temporarily absent, six of the wildest girls were expelled. When she came back, they all returned and behaved perfectly well. "So attached were they to her," says Mr. Brace, "that they had, each in her bosom, carried fragments of her dress as mementoes."

With this winning tenderness of manner Mrs. Hurley combined an unbending firmness of will and purpose. The girls were not only made to love her, but to walk in the ways she set for them.

Their sense of deep obligation to her has been touchingly indicated in the scores of letters received since her death last month. "I owe all I am to her," "She saved me from a life of folly and sin," "She taught me to love work and it has been my salvation," are merely samples of many more.

The girls taken into the Home are not from the courts. They are simply wayward and wilful girls, usually at least half-orphaned, and either without restraint or defying home authority. A few come in merely to study in the night school, or in the cooking, laundry or dressmaking classes. These are usually from respectable homes.

Six rooms in the Elizabeth Home are set apart for lodgers, at $1.50 per week. Meals are not furnished to these girls, but the forty or fifty other girls sheltered at the Home can get meals at six cents each. and all over eighteen are required to pay ten cents a night for lodging. It is believed that no other clean and respectable lodgings for girls are furnished in New York so cheaply.

Mrs. Hurley made these hundreds and thousands of girls feel that each one of them was dear to her, and that nothing could more pain her than to hear that one of them had gone astray. The influence that such love and solicitude must have upon an impressionable young girl can readily be imagined.

One of these girls often came back to see her, and always called her "the Evergreen."

"You are always so fresh and full of life," she said, "just like a beautiful evergreen tree." Another said, "She did not take it all out in talking, as some do. She worked. She did not talk much."

Mrs. Hurley herself, in a recent report of the Home, describes her field and her methods in these vivid words: "To those having a real interest in light-hearted, unthinking, untrained, and often friendless girls, the earnest desire must come to warn, protect and guide them. How foolish and haphazard they are! Nothing seems to daunt them. They love adventure and excitement, and live in the imagination of what is to be. To deal wisely with all this brings one to serious thought. The Elizabeth Home deals with just such a class, whose future wavers in the balance between virtue and its opposite, and who, if they are ever to fill useful places in life, must be taught self-restraint, self-reliance and the value of a good name."

"Our methods of dealing with our girls," she writes again, "are varied, but firmness, kindness, justice and long suffering patience are essential, and withal a sense of humor, which acts as does oil on a creaking hinge. Ill-temper, gloom and sulks disappear before it. Forgiveness has often been found a weapon of power; yet it has to be used judiciously. Praise is another wonderful help. Favoritism should be strictly avoided, as this stirs up envy, jealousy and hatefulness. But the most potent help is work—good, steady work. Our laundry girls, who work the hardest and stay the longest, are the most contented."

Many of the girls who have gone forth from the Home have married men of property and influence—so many that Mr. Brace says that he used humorously to ask Mrs. Hurley from time to time, "What about the heiresses?"

Such girls usually came often back to the Home to visit their beloved Mrs. Hurley. Almost invariably they were unaffected, simple and noble in their bearing, showing none of the silly pride so often displayed under similar circumstances. They had evidently tried to imitate the charmingly refined manners of Mrs. Hurley.

For some years before her death, this most useful and necessary woman had been afflicted with heart disease, and she died from it on November 16. Her funeral was held in the Seventh Street Methodist Church, where the pastor, the Rev. Dr. Henry, delivered an appreciative discourse upon her life-work. Her coffin was covered and surrounded with floral tributes, many of them presented by poor girls who had denied themselves needed comforts in order to honor the memory of their beloved teacher. She was buried in Greenwood Cemetery.

Scores of rich women, long associated with her in her noble efforts, joined their tears with those of humble working girls over her bier. Surely to none more truly than to her can the beautiful words of the prophet be applied: "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."

WHO WILL HELP REDEEM LITTLE DORA?

SOME time ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published an appeal from a missionary in Monrovia, Liberia, Africa, in behalf of a native child, the daughter of Jasper Grant, an African convert, who on account of her father's death was in danger of being taken back to heathenism by her uncle. Under the tribal laws, the next male relative of a deceased parent becomes "headman" for the entire family, and is entitled to take charge of the fatherless children. As the uncle in question was a heathen man, living in the "bush," some distance from the Mission settlement, it would have been a sad thing for the little girl to have gone from the fostering care of the Mission, among people who knew little or nothing of the religion of Jesus. There is, however, a provision in the native laws for "redemption" in such cases; that is, for a certain sum of money, or its equivalent in bullocks, farm produce or cloth, to be paid to the man who stands in the place of the parent, and who then surrenders all claim to the child. All over Africa children have been "redeemed" by missionaries.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter from two missionaries at Cape Palmas, Liberia, the Rev. John Perkins and his wife, in which a touching appeal is made for the "redemption" of a little girl named Dora. Her father having died, she is in danger of being taken away to the "bush" by heathen relatives unless she can be ransomed by the good missionaries. This they are unable to do with their own scanty means, so they appeal to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to help them in saving Dora from a fate which in many respects is worse than death.

Mrs. Perkins writes: "Our dear little Dora (her Christian name given in baptism) is already claimed, and we would like greatly to redeem her and save her from marrying a heathen man, many times older than herself, with whom she would live a wretched life of tribal slavery. If we could save her now, she could be raised in this Mission and marry some convert and live a godly and useful life.

"Our work is among a tribe practically untouched. We eight workers began it in December last year. The Lord has surely been a Shepherd to us. At first it was hard to get any of the native girls to come to the Mission; but things have taken a decided turn for the better, so that now the young girls in the heathen towns nearest to us are crying and begging their heathen parents to let them come to the Mission and "do God-way," as they put it. One ventured to run away the other day, and for her trouble received a terrible beating from her parents. They even rubbed red pepper in her eyes and nose.

"We have nine in the mission now, and many more want to come. It seems as if God himself had put a great hunger in their hearts for something better. Some are already sold, but could be liberated if we had a bullock, or the price of one, to pay for them, to meet the claim their purchasers have on them. Here is great opportunity for any one who wishes to help or save and educate for a Christian career a dear little African girl, whom we have learned to love, but who, we fear, must be swept back into heathenism and a life of sorrow and suffering unless kind hands are extended to save her now. Will not some one help us to save little Dora?"

Surely this missionary's appeal will not be made in vain. Any contributions sent to this journal for the redemption of little Dora should be given quickly in order to be of service. All will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

"Keep Up Your Hearts, My Lads!"

How Bill Cleland, Hero of the Cherry Mine, Sang and Prayed While Facing Death and Cheered His Imprisoned Comrades

William Cleland, the Christian Hero of the Mine, and His Two Children, William and Fanny (Photographed After His Rescue)

IN all the stories of human bravery in the face of peril and death itself there are none that are more thrilling than that which tells of the heroism of the walled-in workers in the ill-fated coal mine at Cherry, Ill. It has already been related in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD how, in the earlier stages of the rescue work, many of the miners gave up their places in the "cage" to those among their fellow-workers who had been injured or who were giving way under the frightful strain. But there came a time, after the sealing of the mine, when all hope for those below seemed to die out.

As the long week of this hourly battle against death drew to a close the shaft where the men had congregated was a charnel house. At least half of the miners lay dead, and others were dying. But even in that terrible time of trial God provided a comforter in the shape of a Christian miner, William Cleland. He was a stanch believer, and now he became the mainstay of his companions in rallying them to hope. Day after day he counseled them in their underground prison.

"Keep up your hearts, lads. God is with us. Don't despair. Others have been shut off from the light of day as we are, and in God's good time came out alive. So will we. The Lord is with us, even here, and great is his mercy."

Then he would murmur the Lord's Prayer.

One day, he set forth to find water when all possible supply seemed exhausted. As he started, he said to those he left behind: "If I don't succeed, or if I don't come back, kill the mule." At the words, the Lithuanian miners in the hapless company threw up their hands and wailed. Their religion proscribed such a thing, and they were willing to sacrifice their lives rather than do wrong.

What little food the miners had they shared with each other. George Siemitz had been frugal. His lunch pail contained four slices of bread, one piece of pie and a pickle. He divided his fare, and it was all gone in twenty-four hours. Next, he cut the leather band off his cap, and it was soon chewed and eaten by the famished men. His leather gloves, thick and soiled, were also disposed of and helped to prolong several lives.

Several miners wrote letters of farewell to their wives, couched in loving words. One of these letters is as follows:

> DEAR WIFE: I am still living, although it is now five o'clock Sunday morning and there is little hope, as the black damp is getting the best of us. There are twenty-one of us altogether here. Dear wife, do not grieve. We will meet again. God bless you. Believe in Him. He will take care of you. I guess we will meet in a better land. When you get this let them know at home. That is all, dear. God bless you! JOHN LORIMER.

Lorimer was rescued alive afterward.

When the rescuers went down on Saturday, November 20—a week after the accident—the first sound that came out of the depths to cheer them was the air of a religious hymn. In a little pause, one of them said: "Listen, boys."

Then, like an echo from far away, came the sound of a voice singing. They strained their ears, and presently they caught the words of the well-known hymn:

> Abide with me,
> Fast falls the eventide;
> The darkness deepens,
> Lord, with me abide.

The sound died out, and the miners were wiping their eyes, not realizing its significance for the moment, when one of them cried: "That's Bill Cleland. I know his voice."

And it proved to be Cleland, who had kept hope alive in the men by his brave Christian spirit. He, too, was rescued, and although there were still many sad hearts and tear-stained faces in Cherry the courage and the prayers and the songs of one brave heart, which trusted in God, had made a bright, redeeming episode in the dark tragedy of the mine.

An accident somewhat like that in the Cherry mine occurred after a fire at the Penihiweeiher colliery, South Wales, in October. After the fire, a number of the men who had failed to escape by the shafts made for a place of safety underground. William Jones, one of the miners, told of their experiences. He said: "After traveling a considerable distance—for we were almost two miles from the shaft bottom—some of the party were overcome and fell. One of the men suggested that we should all lie down and get our faces as near the rails as possible, in order to get what little air there was in the pit. This we did, and lay prostrate for some time, and, when we recovered a little, every one of us prayed as best we could, and sang snatches of hymns. It was a great relief to us that we heard footsteps coming in the distance. We called out, and the rescuers came and took us along the roadway, and we climbed up a ladder into the air and to safety."

Louisville's Man-by-Man Mission

A CAMPAIGN for men has just been organized in Louisville, Ky., and the preliminary meetings are now in progress on a plan which is sure to be of interest to every one who hopes for an evangelism that will be successful in reaching men.

Personal evangelism will be the key of the work. It is quite natural, therefore, that the movement should be called the "Man-by-Man Mission." Louisville has been divided into districts, and over forty churches have signified their desire to enter the movement and have appointed committees. Rev. R. A. Walton, the evangelist of the movement, outlines the programme briefly thus:

First. Forming personal workers' classes, for discussion of methods for reaching men.

Second. Holding men's meetings, to which we especially invite the unsaved.

Third. Holding a large central meeting, to which the men of all the districts will be invited.

Fourth. Organizing a Brotherhood, or such other organization as shall perpetuate the mission in each individual church.

Christmas Cheer

WE are much too ready to forget that Christianity means joy and hope. Some of us never quite lose the notion that the ideal Christian is a grave and austere personage, who takes a serious view of life and is seldom known to smile. When Jesus was born in Bethlehem, a chorus of angels broke the silence of midnight with a song of triumphant gladness. "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will to men," was the burden of their music.

Christmas means uplift, inspiration, courage and cheer in every heart, in every home, on board the railway train, in the ship's cabin, in the palace of the king, in the hut of the peasant, in office and counting-room and factory. The one thing that the non-Christian nations lack is the glow of good cheer and the buoyancy of hope which Jesus Christ brought to the earth.

God rest you, merry gentlemen
Let nothing you dismay.
For Jesus Christ, our Saviour.
Was born on Christmas day.

It seems well that this most significant anniversary of the world, the pivotal point in human history, should be celebrated in midwinter. There are, of course, portions of the globe where Christmas comes with summer warmth and pomp of flowers and foliage, but to most of us, dwellers in the temperate zones, its association is with snow and ice, storm and gale. It sparkles on the brow of winter like a diadem, and it fitly crowns December, making it in its exodus the proud monarch of the whole year.

Other months have their red-letter days, not one of which can be mentioned in comparison with Christmas day. If we feel in ourselves the slightest tendency to depression, if anywhere in our minds there are harbored cowardly doubts and quivery fears and trembling distrusts of our heavenly Father's goodness, let these be driven out in the cheer of Christmas-tide. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

Nicaragua Needs a Lesson

REVOLUTIONS come and go in Central America without exciting much interest in the United States, but the recent shooting of two Americans on the order of President Zelaya of Nicaragua, on the charge that they were actively engaged against his authority, has caused President Taft to show a strong hand. The American consul asked that the sentences against the two men be not carried out until the charges had been more fully investigated. Time for investigation was not allowed, and the Americans were summarily shot. The result is that warships have been ordered to Greytown, and the insurgents have been recognized as belligerents.

President Zelaya may have been trying the old Central and South American tactics of having some foreigners shot to embroil his country with another country, thus arousing the so-called patriotism of the people, and in the midst of the excitement the rebellion would disappear. It would seem an odd way, but it has worked before this.

The United States does not approve of its citizens taking active part against a friendly power, but it does insist that charges shall be fully proved when made against them. Methods of the Middle Ages are too much in vogue in Central America, and the United States will land marines, if necessary, to teach the much-needed lesson that the world has reached the twentieth century mark. Mr. Taft has refused to meet the Nicaraguan Minister, and President Zelaya may disappear as an irritating factor in international affairs unless he can make a satisfactory explanation. A demand has been made for an indemnity of $100,000. Of course the money, if it can be collected from the elusive head of the Nicaraguan republic, will be scant consolation to the bereaved families, but it may touch President Zelaya in a tender spot—the pocket—a method of keeping the peace which has been found effective in cooling hot-headed South American rulers before this. If the report is true that the two Americans were not in Nicaraguan territory, but that an expedition was sent to capture them across the border, it makes the case all the worse for the Nicaraguans. The report that other Americans are held prisoners in Zelaya's dungeons should be investigated at once.

Great Britain is famous for the protection she accords her subjects and the way in which she demands fair treatment for them in any land. The United States cannot be backward in demanding that her citizens receive fair trial when charges are brought against them, otherwise they will be made to suffer on light pretexts when any international bully wishes to make trouble with impunity.

Humble Heroes

SELDOM has there been recorded a more inspiring story of courage in the face of deadly danger than that of the men who were "walled in" for a whole week in the burning St. Paul coal mine. Companions in disaster, they were much more than comrades. In the first hours of excitement, many had generously relinquished their own chances of quick rescue in favor of their injured mates; but it was when the mine was sealed, during those seven long days of living burial for over two hundred men, that the true nobility of the humble underground toilers asserted itself. "The best hearts are the bravest," and that gloomy mine held among its prisoners a little band of heroes, to whom the world cannot pay too high honors. Sharing their food, to the last crumb, with those who had none; tending the weak and the injured; cheering the faint-hearted and despairing and soothing the last moments of the dying, theirs was a record of shining self-denial and of devotion to the highest conception of friendship and duty, which it would be difficult to parallel. Among these heroes of the fire-damp, the rugged figure of "Bill" Cleland stands out picturesquely. This poor, illiterate wage-earner had taken Christ into his heart and life long before. He had learned to cast his burden on the Lord, and to face the world and its trials always with a smile and a song. He it was who led the imprisoned miners to look up through the darkness to God for light and rescue. Day by day he sang, exhorted, comforted, encouraged. And when at the last the rescuers were nearing them, dreading lest all should have perished, it was Cleland's clear voice leading in a hymn that penetrated through the walls of the mine and came to the gladdened ears of the rescuers like a strain of heavenly music. Human history makes little account of the humble heroes. It keeps its honors and its plaudits for the famous and the mighty. But in the eternal record of worthy deeds there are few whose names will stand higher than those of the self-denying heroes of the mine.

England's Budget Battle

ALL England is agitated over the battle between the Lords and Commons over the budget. Lord Rosebery, in a memorable speech to the Peers recently, called the struggle "the greatest in the lifetime of any man since 1832." He warned them that to reject the budget would be to stake the very existence of the House of Lords upon the result. It would be wiser and safer to allow it to pass, and, after giving the country a six months' experience of the heavy loss to capital and trade that would follow, then make it the issue of the next election. Lord Rosebery went even further in his endeavor to console the uneasy Peers and assured them that when the nation understood the wrong the budget proposed to inflict, their lordships would gain general sympathy and support, because, like the American colonists, they would be subjected to "taxation without representation." There was just a touch of buncombe in this, especially when it is regarded as a plea for a privileged class who have been evading just taxation all along and putting the heavy load on the shoulders of the comman people. The British press is openly discussing the need of some drastic reform applied to the House of Peers, which has been so long and so persistently obstructive of measures for the general welfare.

VERY IMPORTANT

EVERY year we are in receipt of communications from subscribers to the effect that, had they known that they could renew their subscriptions around Christmas time without financial loss, they would have glady availed themselves of the opportunity.

We have, therefore, decided to make this point very clear to those whose subscriptions expire after the turn of the year, by sending them the following notice and explanation:

If you NOW desire to avail yourself of any of our Premium Offers or of any Magazine Combination, or wish NOW to obtain our marvelous "DREAMLAND" Calendar and the superb Photogravure, "DAUGHTERS OF DORCAS," measuring 16x21 Inches, all you have to do is to renew your subscription TO-DAY. On receipt of your renewal your subscription will be advanced from the date on which it now expires for ONE WHOLE YEAR. You DO NOT LOSE A SINGLE DAY by so doing, and you make sure of immediately getting whatever premium you may desire.

Of course, we endeavor to keep in stock the year round all the premiums our renewing subscribers may require, but should you for any reason wish to anticipate your subscription in order to get Premiums, Our Calendar, or Magazine Combinations, AT ONCE, you will lose nothing by renewing now, as you get an entire year added to your present expiry date.

GENERAL NOTES

—CONGRESSMAN DAVID A. DE ARMOND, a most faithful and capable representative and one of the best parliamentarians the House has known in a generation, was burned to death in an accidental fire in his home at Butler, Mo., recently. With him in the blazing room was his little five-year-old grandson. Though unable to pass the fiery barrier to rescue them, their agonized relatives could hear above the roar of the flames the voice of De Armond calling out words of cheer to the terrified boy: "Never mind, Waddy; it's all right!" Forgetful of himself, his last conscious act was an effort to allay the terror of the child who was under his protection. There was something very pitiful, as well as noble, in such a death.

—PIONEER OF ITS KIND, the first drugless hospital in America has been opened in New York. The Neurological Institute for the treatment of nervous and mental diseases will not only have no apothecary shop, but it will practically be without surgeons and surgical instruments. Its staff are neither Christian Scientists, Faith Healers, "New Thought" doctors nor Emanuel Movement practitioners, but eminent alienists and neurologists of the highest standing in the regular medical profession. The treatment will include movements, exercises, dietary, baths, "mental suggestion" and general restorative hygiene. Charity as well as pay patients will be taken. The whole experiment is a notable departure from the old theories and methods to which the medical profession seemed bound by inexorable tradition.

Trouble With Nicaragua

THERE is trouble between the United States and the government of Nicaragua over the summary execution of Leonard Groce and Leroy Cannon, two Americans found aiding the revolutionists, who were fighting against the rule of President Zelaya. Groce was president of three mining companies. He went to Nicaragua from Texas ten years ago, and in five years amassed a fortune. It is said that he had a million dollars invested in mines there. Groce claimed that President Zelaya imposed murderous taxes upon his property and threatened the confiscation of fully one-half of his fortune, which he gave as a reason for aiding those who were opposed to the president's rule. Groce and Cannon were captured, tried by court-martial and condemned to death, and were shot at sunrise the morning after their capture, even while a delegation of Americans and many natives were petitioning the president to give the Americans a hearing. Not even the general of the Nicaraguan army expected the two Americans would be summarily dealt with and pleaded for their life, but Zelaya, declaring that without those Yankees he could quickly put an end to the revolution, ordered their execution. It is charged that it was a piece of personal spite that led to the execution. At any rate, the explanation of the Nicaraguan government was not at all satisfactory to the authorities at Washington, and at the request of Secretary Knox the Navy Department ordered the cruiser Tacoma to sail immediately from Guantanamo, Cuba, to Cristobal, in the Panama Canal Zone, and directed the gunboat Marietta, at Guantanamo, to be ready to sail on a moment's notice for Port Limon, Costa Rica. It is believed that the Vicksburg, which sailed from Guatemala for Corinto, on the west coast of Nicaragua, and the Des Moines, that sailed at the same time from Colon, Panama, for Bluefields on the east coast, must have reached their destination. It is intended that the Tacoma shall take aboard 400 marines now on the isthmus, and that the Marietta shall convey from Guantanamo and San Juan, Porto Rico, more than 300 marines. At the present time it looks as though 3,000 marines and six cruisers and gunboats will be in Nicaraguan waters within five days. At a Cabinet meeting, Secretary Knox was instructed to make a demand of $100,000 indemnity from Zelaya for the two Americans shot, with a specific time limit named, and Zelaya will have to surrender immediately or suffer the consequences. There is scarcely a ruler on the earth that would manifest such consummate folly as President Zelaya in daring to trifle with the rights and lives of American citizens. God in his providence maintains justice in the earth by the administration of rulers and governments, maintaining the right and punishing the wrong, and if our government shall see fit to deal severely with Zelaya for the murder of our citizens it will only be acting in obedience to the higher law of the Highest King, who always declares his intention to protect his children and punish their oppressors.

I will punish all that oppress them. (Jer. 30: 20.)

Cure for Seasickness

Mr. F. Andruck has invented an air-cushion chair which he claims will prove a cure for seasickness. He has had four of them set up on the aft promenade deck of the Blucher, of the Hamburg-American Line, and had passengers test them on her latest journey from Hamburg to New York. The new device resembles a barber's chair, and according to the claim of the inventor neutralizes the rolling of the ship so much that seasickness becomes practically unknown. Mr. Andruck was a passenger on the Blucher on her latest trip this way, and had a chance to test the value of his invention, and gathered some testimonials from his fellow-travelers who had used the chairs and said that they had done all that was claimed for them. In this age of alleviating pain, reducing discomfort of every kind, the invention of Mr. Andruck is likely to prove a great boon to the hundreds of thousands who are compelled to sail the seas. Time and a larger experimentation will be needed to prove the success of this invention. If it shall stand the test, it will have been one of the greatest blessings of modern times. For it seems that, with all the knowledge of medical science, no cure has been found for seasickness. There is sickness of the heart for which earth has found no cure. The surging, boisterous waves of time cause a deathly sickness for which earth has no remedy. Christ alone can give health, peace and rest to the human soul, sick with its sorrows and its sins.

He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted. (Luke 4 : 18.)

New York Temperance Victory

The liquor traffic is more strongly entrenched in New York than in any other State of the Union, and hence the no-license victories at the polls this autumn have surprised the friends as well as delighted the hearts of the enemies of the saloons. From the headquarters of the Anti-Saloon League have been given out reports from about all the towns in the State voting on the question. The report indicates a net gain for no-license of 64 towns, which with the net gain of 24 towns in the spring makes a gain of 88 dry towns for the year. About four towns a year has been the average net increase for the ten years preceding, so that the gain during the past year for the dry column is almost twice as large as that of the past ten years altogether, which shows that the tidal wave has struck the Empire State, and that where the right of local option is permitted it is rapidly going dry. There are now over 400 towns entirely dry, less than 300 towns entirely wet, and the remainder of the counties of the State part wet and part dry. All the temperance and church organizations and citizens generally who believe in the highest civic virtue united in this warfare against the saloons, and rejoice in the victory which God has wrought by his Spirit through the instrumentality of his children.

On a Nicaraguan River

President Zelaya of Nicaragua

I have wounded them that they were not able to rise: they are fallen under my feet. I beat them small as the dust before the wind: I did cast them out as the dirt in the streets. (Ps. 18 : 38, 42.)

Endowed for Life

Private Charles J. Morris, Company G, United States Signal Corps, became suddenly independent the other day in a peculiar manner. Mrs. Benjamin Levin, wife of a wealthy jeweler of Chicago, took her ten-year-old son Robert to see the Statue of Liberty, in New York harbor. A high wind blew the hat of the boy overboard, and in reaching for it he tumbled off the pier and was drowning. Morris, hearing his cry, ran down to the end of the pier, jumped overboard, swam to the boy, seized him, and returned with him while the waves were beating over both of them, and succeeded in making a safe landing, the boy meanwhile having lost consciousness, which was soon restored. The next day, Mrs. Levin and the boy went back to the island to thank Morris for his act, and made two propositions to him: one was to accept a position at $125 a month, to be guaranteed for life by the rich jeweler; the other was to receive eighty acres of land in Florida, together with a year's expenses to put the place in shape for fruit culture for a plantation. They told him he could have until New Year's Day to decide which offer he would accept. Private Morris did not know how to make answer, his surprise was so great, but he told them that he had done only his duty and really did not expect any reward. No true soldier or hero ever performs his acts with a view to a temporal reward. That very fact would spoil them either for a soldier or a hero; and yet in the long run rewards of the highest character attend the discharge of duty. This singular act of gratitude upon the part of Mrs. Levin is as rare as it is beautiful. There is too large a measure of ingratitude everywhere. There are officers and teachers in the Sunday School, workers in the Y. M. C. A. and in the Young People's Societies of the churches, and faithful pastors who are saving the souls of the children from the waves of moral evil; and while there are some parents who have a keen appreciation of the services of such rescuers, the large majority of them feel no sense of gratitude and offer to pay no debt of obligation. In receiving the gifts of our heavenly Father, and the offices of salvation upon the part of our Redeemer, while there are some who feel thankful, there are others who take it as a matter of course.

Christ on his way to Jerusalem rescued ten men from the death of leprosy, but only one gave practical expression of gratitude for his salvation.

And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God. And Jesus answering said, Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? (Luke 17 : 15, 17.)

Restitution

One of the strangest wills ever made was that of George Brown, Jr., the noted gambler and racehorse man, which was filed in the Probate Court at Kansas City, Mo., recently. "It is my desire, as far as possible," a clause of the will reads, "to repay every person, man, woman and child, any money which I may have won from him by gambling during my lifetime; and I direct my executor to make efforts to learn their names and reimburse them to the full amount, with interest from the day the money was won." This penitent gambler has set an example here which it would be well for those to follow who make larger pretensions to integrity. Too little attention is paid to making good the dishonesties of the past. There are some wrongs to fellow-men which never can be repaired, but there are others that can and should be made right. The gambler caught the old-fashioned Bible thought of restitution, which is plainly laid down in the law of Moses, demanding that the thief make restitution for his crime, in the following words:

For he should make full restitution. (Ex. 22 : 3.)

Music Charms Snakes

Curator Ditmars, of the Bronx Park, New York, sent to Singapore for several phonographic records of the music made by Hindu snake-charmers in performing their tricks with reptiles. One of the big king cobras raised his head high in the air and glided across to where the phonograph rested. The reptile eyed the instrument curiously, and its head began to wave to and fro, keeping time to the strains of music; several others joined him in their near approach to the phonograph and in their expressions of delight at the music. After a number of records had been used the reptiles sank into a state of hypnotism, and in that condition they were lifted back into their cage. Music is a divine art, the expression of infinite melody, with the tendency to charm the serpents of our nature into harmlessness. It has been used in the worship of God in every dispensation and in every campaign of the Cross as a help in subduing the serpents of sin.

Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord. (Eph. 5 : 19.)

Their Happiest Christmas

Personal Reminiscences Recalling Christmas Days

By Well-Known American Men and Women

OF all our holidays Christmas is more connected with home life and the family fireside than any other. It is a time for children, settled in distant places, to gather once more beneath the old roof-tree with parents and grandparents, with hearts filled with the joy of reunion. The many beautiful customs which have grown for its observance have given it a charm unknown to other festivals, and through all the rejoicing and merry-making there is also a deep undercurrent of gratitude for "the great Gift of all the ages."

The impression of Yuletide never fades, and sad indeed is the lot of any person who cannot look back to some Christmas morning when the ground was covered with its snowy mantle, the tinkle of sleigh-bells in the air, and relatives old and young trooping in bearing greetings and presents, a memorial of the time when the wise men brought gifts across the starlit fields of Bethlehem.

No two Christmases, however, are just alike. People in different parts of the country celebrate it in various ways, and above all other days it seems full of interesting and unusual happenings. With this in mind THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wrote to a few American men and women well known for their work in philanthropic fields, in the church, the public service, teaching and literature, and asked them for a brief reminiscence of their happiest Christmas. The answers given below are full of timely and human interest, and show how great and little things have alike their place and influence in shaping careers known to every American.

Made Happy by a Book

By JOSEPH A. ALTSHELER, of New York, Author of Widely Read Books on American Themes

MY happiest Christmas occurred when I was at the age of ten, and it was made so by a single book. I was fond of reading, but the part of Kentucky in which I was born and in which I spent my boyhood was thinly settled, and we lived far from any railroad. Books, except those usual in schools, were exceedingly rare, and a boy hungering for romance and adventure had little to feed upon.

This was a snowy Christmas—the weather is often exceedingly cold in southern Kentucky—and when I rose at daylight I found in my stocking a copy of Captain Mayne Reid's Three Boy Hunters. That was all, but it was enough. It was not a great book, and it may be forgotten now, but it took me into a land of enchantment. I can remember every incident of it to this day. I can remember the pictures and the text opposite them, and, what is more, I can feel now, through the power of memory, some of the happiness that single story of adventure gave me.

A Wartime Christmas

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Author of Inspiring Books for Young People and Contributor to Magazines

THERE are moments in life when it is very hard to speak the truth, or perhaps it would be more exact to say when it is nearly impossible to tell a true story. One of these has come to me now, as I try to single out from many a happy Christmas the one that glows in memory with pre-eminent lustre.

My happiest Christmas did not come when I was a child, but some years later, before the Civil War was over, when for a while I lived in a wee bit of a house in a border State, on the very edge of a great encampment. The white tents sheltered thousands of men, paroled Federal soldiers, who had been returned in exchange from Southern prisons of war. They could not go back to their commands until they were released from their parole. We sent back to the South Confederates who had been taken prisoners by us, but we did not return them in quite the shape that our poor fellows came back. There was scanty food in the South during those terrible four years for their own people, and they had little with which to feed the soldiers who were taken in battle. Hence, when they came back to the exchange camps, they needed rest and food, and medicine and kind care.

In my bit of a house I had only four rooms, one of which was always used as a partial office for the colonel and his orderlies, so that in reality I had only three. There were three little children there, and always guests. On the Christmas of that special year dear ones came from home to pay us a visit, and when I drove back with them from the station I found that the boys in blue had transformed the tiny dwelling into a bower of evergreen. The bare walls were not merely garlanded, they were hidden under green boughs. Flowers had been brought and set upon mantels and tables, and there were gifts, made by the men from bits of wood and bits of bone, that I long kept as treasures. A young doctor gave me a white, fluffy dog, with a blue ribbon around its neck. It was a thoroughbred, and had taken a prize somewhere. An Irish soldier, with a rich brogue, presented me with a little breakfast castor that held several bottles, wishing me a Merry Christmas and saying that I had been a mother to him. I was twenty-six and he was forty, but I had helped to nurse him, and he was grateful.

That Christmas is, upon the whole, the one that I set apart as the happiest I ever spent. I had my dear ones close around me, the time was thrilling and splendid, though often it was sad enough, and the days went on bravely to the sound of the drum and the bugle.

The Joy of Work Accomplished

By Mrs. DIANA BELAIS, President of the New York Anti-Vivisection Society

IT is with much pleasure I write a line for your valued paper, in its tribute to the season of kind and loving thought. A reminiscence of my happiest Christmas does not go back very far; indeed, it is all but in the present—being Christmas of 1908—and did not consist so much of an incident as of an inner glow of deep satisfaction, that the specialized work upon which I had but recently entered some few months before had shown so much vital progress, and gave every indication that the principle of mercy, peace, and good will on earth might some day, not despairingly remote, extend unquestioned to the subhuman being, even as it does now to the human being.

A Naval Officer's Christmas Gifts

By Rear-Admiral CHARLES D. SIGSBEE, Retired, a Naval Veteran of Two Wars

I THINK the kind of specialized joy one has on Christmas Day tends to run in epochs. The child finds it in receiving, the younger people in both giving and receiving, and the older people in giving. All feel the charm of the day and its revered history. A joy on Christmas seems many times a joy, because all of one's world seems joyous.

I myself have had many a happy return of the day. I can single out one as the very merriest, if not, in some ways, to be classed as the very happiest. I was a young officer, a bachelor, then doing duty at a great naval shore station. On Christmas Eve a general masquerade party was given, as usual. It lasted till four o'clock in the morning, or even later.

I decided to have my joke in giving my presents, so, for a special feature, I had selected three favorite young ladies to be teased. For weeks I prepared, secretly. First, I scoured the town until I had purchased the three largest stockings that it contained. At least I trust there were none larger. I made purchases in that town, and in others, of "notions" of many kinds, and added others that I had picked up in my travels. Each article was wrapped in four separate papers; each paper was tied with a string, hard-knotted, and with the ends cut off short. Then the stockings were stowed, from toe to top, with pretty things, useful things and silly things, in alternation. Even a small onion had its place. My attendant, "Mose," laid the stockings in a huge "wash" basket, for the mother of Mose was my washerwoman.

Acting under my instructions, Mose took the basket and timed himself so as to deliver each stocking about one half-hour after its recipient had reached home. I knew that each would be tired, but could not sleep till every string had been cut and every package had been examined. I knew I should hear all about it in Christmas waking hours—and I did! But I wasn't wholly bad, for in each stocking, at the very toe end, the reward of hard labor was found in the best present of all—something worthy of the laborer.

Soon the story was all over town: first, that one young lady had been favored, then two, then three. Please note my strategy: one would have been special, two would have been rivalry, but three—well, three were just good fun. But in the course of successive events I married one of those young ladies!

A Christmas at Sea

By MRS. FRANCES SQUIRE POTTER, Author, Educator and Leader in the Movement for Woman Suffrage

IT was the Christmas of 1892. I was on the Atlantic Ocean, with my husband and my first child, who was at that time about five weeks old. Some days before Christmas, our ship, the Umbria, on seeking to make speed during what was called the heaviest storm known on the Atlantic for forty years, had broken her shaft. For several days we rolled in the trough of the waves, not far from the rocks along the coast of Halifax. Signals were sent up to attract the attention of any other steamers which might be in our neighborhood, oil was poured on the troubled waters, but not until the night before Christmas did the storm abate, or any response come to our rockets. On the evening of the 24th of December a small vessel, which had been quarantined for cholera, as I remember it, approached us and offered to tow us to land. We went to bed on Christmas Eve hopeful. On the morning of Christmas we found that the cables either had broken in the night, or had been cut, and the little cholera vessel was nowhere in sight. We were adrift again.

At about eleven o'clock on Christmas morning, in answer to a call from the captain of the Umbria, we all assembled in the large parlor of the ship, and the captain read the prayers for ships lost at sea. It was the first time that I had been able to meet with the other passengers, but on this occasion I joined them, taking my baby with me. Mr. Chubb, of the Society for Ethical Culture, his wife, and his first child, then about four months old, were near our party. The solemnity of the occasion was profound.

After the services were over, I remained in my corner with my sleeping child. Mrs. Chubb and her little daughter remained also. We exchanged a few words about the significance of

> The month and the happy morn,
> Wherein the Son of Heaven's Eternal King,
> Of wedded maid and Virgin Mother born,
> Our great redemption from above did bring.

While we were speaking, a realization of Christmas, such as I never before had experienced, stole over me. I felt that on this day, the event most stupendous in its effect upon human history had taken place. That the Son of heaven's Eternal King had laid aside the robes of everlasting light to become the most helpless of creatures upon this earth, a poor little baby in a manger, began to mean to me the wonder of wonders. As I looked down at the quiet face of my little girl, my first-born, I felt welling up in my heart a great gratitude, and a rapture of happiness which has echoed through the Christmas emotions of every winter since.

On New Year's Day we reached New York harbor. Our engineer had managed to patch up our machinery sufficiently to bring us in. But no earthly harbor then or since has been able to offer a like security to that spiritual harbor which I entered when we were lost at sea.

Rich in Happy Christmas Days

By MARY E. WOOLLEY, of South Hadley, Mass., President of Mount Holyoke College

IT would be a pleasure to have a part in the Christmas issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I have been trying in vain to think of a way in which to answer your question. As I look back I realize how fortunate I have been in having happy Christmases, and I find that I am entirely unable to select one as the "happiest." I can only wish that every one who reads your paper might have as delightful memories of that season.

Last Christmas the Best

By W. R. MOODY, of Northfield, Mass., Educator and Christian Worker

MY last Christmas was my best Christmas, and it has been my experience that every Christmas becomes happier, because my blessings have increased and my capacity for enjoying them has also expanded with the years. For this reason I believe that Christmas 1909 will be the happiest that I have ever had.

Of course, the recurrence of Christmas brings sad memories as well as joyful ones, but at the same time there is always the promise of that great reunion and home-coming in the future, the joy of which will make us forget many of the disappointments and sorrows of the past.

Where Others Were Made Happy

By REV. WILLIAM WILKINSON, of Trinity Parish, New York, Whose Active Religious Campaign in the Financial District Has Given Him the Designation of "the Bishop of Wall Street"

'TIS hard to tell which of sixty Christmases one has lived was the gladdest. I was born in Yorkshire, England, where Christmas is made much of.

I think, however, my most happy Christmas was spent in Minneapolis. Here Christmas is not such a general joy, I think, as Thanksgiving. However, the Christmas I describe was full of joy, because it was full of help for the needy.

I went to a friend of mine and said, "I have a few deserving friends, to whom I mean to send cheer this festival time. I think you may want to give a turkey." He looked at me and said, "Sit down." I sat down. He said, "Do you know what a waste of time it is for you to go asking a turkey of this or that man?" I said, "It depends on whether you are a rich man clipping coupons, or a poor man or woman, destitute, whether 'tis waste or not." I shall never forget his reply.

"It is a waste of time on your part. You have no need to do it. If you know any old men who are not drinkers, any consumptives, or widows who are trying to make both ends meet, any persons who have become poor, who are respectable—I do not care how many they are—give each a turkey, or what you deem needful. But first, and mind this, buy the best you can find; if one is not enough, then buy two, and take $10 for all other things needful for Christmas cheer. Bring me the bill, and it will add to the pleasure of my Christmas," and he added, "we do not know whether next Christmas we shall be where turkeys are eaten. Anyhow, we will make good this Christmas."

There are no words to tell the joy I had in hearing this. I went from that office as from a shrine. I began to prepare the good things for the persons who needed them. I at once let each person know a turkey would come at Christmas. I bought turkeys from farmers I knew. I took the turkeys, after dark, to their destination. This took several nights. Those who received them were delighted—not half as much as I was—and when I sat at the head of my table that Christmas Day, having been to church, I proposed to the founder of the feast a toast of good will, and said a prayer for God's blessing upon him.

Hard to Choose the Happiest

By REV. SILAS C. SWALLOW, D.D., Author and Well-Known Advocate of Reforms in Our Social and Public Life

AT the age of seventy, in the language of another,

> I remember, I remember
> How my childhood fleeted by,
> The mirth of its December
> And the warmth of its July.

But whether the happiest Christmas was occasioned by a morning realization of a midnight dream of a stocking filled to the brim with Christmas goodies for this then six-year-old towhead; or by the reluctant consent of my intended's father to become the father-in-law of a roving Methodist preacher; or by the Christmas prospect of a New Year's marriage to a girl destined to be the best wife that ever stood at the nuptial altar; or by some other event, or occasion, or experience, I am at a loss to determine, since

Christmas in an Old New England Town

By LUTHER BURBANK, of Santa Rosa, Calif., Wizard of the Fruits and Flowers

WHEN recalling a happy Christmas there comes to my memory a very merry group of boys and girls on a glassy sheet of ice, on my father's farm. In the beautiful New England town of Lancaster, Mass., were extensive peat meadows, where several

A CHRISTMAS WALK

By ELIZABETH L. GEBHARD

MISS DEBORAH PLEYALL had been tying up packages all the afternoon, and her dusky maiden, Trilby, had gone forth over and over again bearing Christmas gifts, in bright holly papers, or snowy white packages, tied in red and green. Trilby was sure that Santa Claus had never possessed so able and willing an assistant before. She counted herself doubly fortunate if, between trips, she might answer some of the many rings of the doorbell in the afternoon which preceded Christmas and come back with her arms full of Christmas remembrances for the household which she served.

But Trilby had gone on one of her long rounds when the bell gave forth a prolonged peal as if rung by jubilant fingers. Miss Deborah opened the door herself, to admit an old friend and teacher from the Training School for Girls, on the outskirts of the city, and with her two more dusky maidens. If Trilby was happy in her Christmas work, these two attendants of Miss Colby fairly scintillated Christmas cheer as they sat down in Miss Deborah's little parlor, their arms full of unwieldy packages, with twigs of holly crowning each gift.

"I brought the girls with me to carry bundles this year," said Miss Colby.

"You must feel like Santa Claus' helpers," said Miss Deborah, turning toward the girls, "except that you come in at the door instead of down the chimney. Did you ever read 'The Night Before Christmas'?"

"No," answered Mary the sunny-faced, "but we are going to hang up our stockings, and so is Miss Colby."

"Perhaps mine will be empty," suggested their teacher.

"Oh, no!" exclaimed both girls, with a sudden withholding of information.

"When they are all busy with their stockings, I will have time to look at my own gifts, which are now on a high shelf," their teacher said to her friend; and with this she left the girls to Miss Deborah, while she went to have a little talk in the grandmother's room.

The sparkle in the eyes of both girls had reached their tongues by this time, and even Carrie, the quieter of the two, began to tell how they had stopped and left gifts at a home where two pretty young girls met them at the door, and at an Old Folks' Home, before they reached Miss Deborah's house. "Oh, I'll never forget this walk," said Mary. "We saw Christmas trees in the windows, and green wreaths with red bows, and boys hurrying with baskets, and beautiful ladies with their arms full of presents."

"Do you have a Christmas tree at the Training School?" asked Miss Deborah.

"A great tall one, with streamers from the tree away across the chapel. That is, Christmas night," answered Carrie, "and we sing carols then, too, and every one gets a present."

"Santa Claus treats you pretty well, with both stockings and a Christmas tree," said Miss Deborah; and Mary, with the wistful hope of a child, asked, "Do you really believe there's a Santa Claus?"

"I know that there are beautiful stories about him," Miss Deborah replied. "He came down the chimney and filled all the stockings in 'The Night Before Christmas.'"

"We never heard of that," said Carrie, and Miss Deborah took a big picture book from a table near by, and read to these girls whose childhood had never held the sweet things of other children, and whose young lives had already strayed into wrong-doing, the poem of happy holiday doings that children love, of the stockings hanging by the fireplace on Christmas Eve in the quiet room, the children all tucked away snug in their beds, the sound of the bells and the hoofs of the reindeer, Santa Claus with his sleigh packed full of toys, and his coming down the chimney with his bag and filling all the stockings.

"It was a fairyland of delight to Mary and Carrie"

The faces of the two girls changed from quiet interest to happy laughter over Dunder and Blixen, and Cupid and Comet, again to wistful longing as the stockings were filled by St. Nicholas himself out of his great pack. Both heads bent eagerly over the pictures of drums and sleds, cradles and dolls. "I'd like a doll myself," said Mary, while Miss Deborah's heart gave a sudden thump of pity and determination over this girl of sixteen, still longing for the unpossessed joys of childhood.

Just then Miss Deborah's pretty sister came in with a bag of candy for each of the girls, and the merry chatter flew on. "We say 'Christmas gift, Christmas gift,' down South, but we've learned to say 'Merry Christmas' up here," said Mary, "and I'm going to catch Miss Colby sure to-morrow morning."

"Yes, and we had a Santa Claus once in the church at home, but he doesn't come here," said Carrie.

"I know what I want him to bring me next year," said Mary, "a whole suit. I can make it myself, for I've made four coats. I'll never forget all I've learned at the Training School. We've made all the presents for the stockings ourselves. Oh, how good it seems to see the children go past!" exclaimed the girl, turning her head toward the distracting interests of the Christmas streets. "We have not seen them in two years. Did you know that we both have badges?" and each girl opened her coat eagerly, showing red and blue knots of ribbon. "They are for six months' good behavior, and that's how we got the Christmas walk."

The girl's eyes shone with a gladness outstripping their joy over Santa Claus' pack. "We'll never forget the walk or the visit," said Mary, and Carrie nodded her head emphatically, with an earnest "Never!" as they took up the remaining packages and passed out of the door with Miss Colby.

There was one more Christmas gift to leave at its destination, and then a long walk back through the lighted streets, the store windows a-dazzle with gifts and sparkling with Christmas trees, and an occasional Santa Claus, his pack on his back and one foot down a chimney, then a block or two of the wreath-trimmed windows of real homes, and a hill where the children were spending Christmas Eve on long bob-sleds, making the air ring with their merry shouts. Past the glitter and the joy which had been a fairy land of delight to Mary and Carrie, they came to a little stretch of quiet roadway under the stars, and Miss Colby ended the Christmas walk with the story of the wise men who followed the guiding star till it stood over the manger of the Christ-child in the long ago, whose birthday every Christmas since has celebrated.

This was the end of the Christmas walk for the Training School girls, but Miss Deborah's willing feet took her once more over the self-same path on Christmas afternoon, carrying under one arm a large bundle which she left at the gate, and when the carols had been sung and the gifts from the Christmas tree were distributed that night, Mary and Carrie both were the possessors of beautiful dolls.

These precious gifts were the fulfilment of the longings of a starved childhood, and Mary laid aside for the time at least any doubt about there being a real Santa Claus.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—REV. S. M. ZWEMER, the well-known missionary, author of an article on "Oriental Amulets," which appeared in a recent issue of this journal, writes us that all the articles in the illustration were not amulets, but only the little silver-and-gilt ornaments strung on a chain in the upper right-hand corner of the picture. The other articles include a rosary, water pipes, drinking cups and flasks.

—REV. J. M. GRAY, dean of the Moody Institute, Chicago, writes us that the interest in the approaching Christian Workers' Midwinter Conference "is the most marked we have ever known. It gives us reason to hope that it may be an occasion of real revival—the deep, true work of the Holy Spirit, as a means of spiritual awakening for the whole country." The projectors and conductors of the conference "ask prayer for great things" and are sure good results will follow.

—THE WELL-KNOWN EVANGELIST C. H. Yatman, who is conducting a series of revival meetings in Lincoln, Neb., has been dealing sturdy blows at sin. Here are a few of his pithy sentences: "It's 'pay' instead of 'pray'; gold counts more than God." "What is the use of saying to the devil, 'be good'? You need to tell him 'begone.'" "Many churches are successful clubs, hardly that. God's house is not a soup kitchen or concert hall." "The evangelist who can make them laugh is wanted above one who will make them weep for their sins and truly repent."

—THE BOWERY MISSION is indebted to the National Temperance Society for a large consignment of books, which will add greatly to the value of the Mission's new library.

—A CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION of the Bella Cooke Mission has been filed in the office of the county clerk, New York City, and with the Secretary of State at Albany, N. Y. This Mission is organized to put the work of the late Mrs. Cooke—widely known as the "Saint of Second Avenue"—upon a permanent footing. CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have long been interested in her work and her wonderful history of sixty years of invalidism. From her little rear room there went out a spiritual influence that was known far and wide. Among Mrs. Cooke's visitors were many of the richest people in New York, who made her their almoner to the East Side poor. Her daughter, Mrs. Mary E. Pullman, is one of the incorporators of the Mission, and the headquarters of the work are located at 239 East Twenty-seventh Street, Miss Shaw, missionary, being in charge.

"MY poor Katrina!" said Jan. "I am tired. I am sleepy, just like thee. Light thou the candle, and I will cover up the fire."

"No; thou light the candle. I will cover the fire. I am sure thou art tired. Thou hast such a great heart, so much thou feels, thy country is so dear to thee; and as for New York——"

"I love New York! All her streets run through my heart! Many of them I saw christened. I know the men after whom they are called. New York is like my own beautiful daughter; shall I sit still and see her insulted, robbed, bound, made to serve, where mistress she should be? I will not. To my last guilder, to my last breath, I will stand by New York—and all her good sons are of my mind, Katrina."

To these and similar reflections he at length slept, but Katrina heard him arguing hotly in the world of dreams.

But every new day is a fresh day, and brings with it its own strength and cheer. Events that looked threatening and full of trouble at midnight, were bright with sunshine and hope in the morning. England would do justly. America would be forbearing. Life would go on in its usual even tenor when the quarreling element had had its say; "for the days go round, and always we get along somehow," said Madame as a finality.

Such was the breakfast talk of the women; for the Captain slept until the morning was far advanced, and Arent was equally dilatory; so that if they had been anxious about political affairs, they could only have waited as patiently as possible. But they were not at all anxious. Virginia and Rose sat at a large japanned table, making pink rosettes for their fancy aprons, and their conversation was entirely about their own affairs.

"I am in a fright about my clothes bespoke in London," said Rose. "What will the new customs laws do with them? There is a red damask piece, an orange-tawny crêpe, a white and amber lutestring, a blue taffeta, bone lace and fripperies of all kinds; besides a white satin mantua, and above all things, a pink parasol. When I receive them, I shall be sweetly dressed; and I shall give myself a parcel of airs, especially if the Colden girls are present."

"They are nice girls."

"My darling Virginia, they are perfect. I hate perfection. Such lofty intellects! Such complete accomplishments! Heavens! What I have endured from a society so superior to me! Their talk is all of science, or the stars, or of eminent men fit to correspond with their father—that is, on unsacred days; on the Sabbath, it is wholly theological. For you must know Doctor Colden is Scotch; 'from Dunse in the Mearns of Berwickshire'—I feel sure that is the whole name. Gramercy! I have heard it often enough to be doubly sure."

"And what can they know of theology? That is for the dominie to talk about."

"Little innocent! the dominie assists at the considerations. Last Sunday it was about the justice of the Almighty, and that led them to John Calvin, and John Calvin to——"

"Oh, Rose!" interrupted Virginia.

"Such subjects are too high for me. But, oh, to be with General Monckton! After the beautifully virtuous, intellectual life at Governor Colden's, an English man-of-war might help me to feel that I was not quite unworthy to live!" and Virginia answered this tirade only with a little push of her elbow, and a lifted face full of love and laughter. Rose promptly kissed it. "You see now," she added, "why I love you so—you don't talk of the stars and philosophy, nor even of John Calvin or Mr. Franklin, nor of books, books, books! I hate books. I would rather read a love letter than a book; any nice girl would," she added quickly.

"'Will there be some fighting, I wonder?' asked Arent"

"My father reveres John Calvin. We never talk of him commonly. It would not be right. We cannot understand him."

"Such wisdom! It is miraculous! It is most comforting! Is it permitted us to talk of that handsome brother of yours?"

"Of Arent?"

"Is that his delightful name? I am already in love with him. His appearance is most bespeaking."

"Oh, no, dear Rose! A little amusement you would find it. To Arent it would be the great thing in the whole world. He knows not how to pretend anything. Do not fall in love with him. Do not make him fall in love with you. Only a sailor—a trader is he."

"Upon my honor, Virginia, I care not what he is. If I could win his love, I would count it the greatest conquest I shall ever make."

As she spoke the Captain entered the room. He bluffed his tardiness, saying, "Kindly excuse my being late. At the meeting I was kept long last night—in my position that was proper. Virginia, I hear thy brother Arent has returned; where then is he?"

"He also was late to breakfast; and after he had eaten it, I think that he went to the stable. He said he wished to see the horses."

"Very good; but why should Arent go to the stable? Of horses he knows nothing at all. A horse he rides as if he was rowing the poor horse."

"My fader, our Arent went to sea when he was no more than twelve years old."

"That is the truth, and many better things than riding a horse the sea has taught him. Sink or swim, our Arent is a sailor, every inch of him. In great storms, I have watched him at the wheel. His joy, his triumph, it was to get the best of the roaring winds and the big waves. So clever he would lift his ship over them, so steady guide her through the black troughs, shouting to her many strong words, petting her, praising her, or if she made creaking and whimpering too much, scolding a little—'that was not the way to behave, she must be of great courage, she must fight for her life. Did she want to go to the bottom, and take good men with her?' and all the time just shaking his head at the lashing of the sea water, cutting him like knives. Little girls, at such hours I thanked God with all my heart that I was a father;" and Captain Jansen's blue eyes grew misty, and looked away to some far-off horizon of his memory.

"When he leaves the sea, all about horses he can soon learn," continued the Captain. "That was his father's way. Now I can drive as well as any man, and I could ride also, but I wish not to ride; and a good trade I can make in horses, as good as any one ought—eh, Virginia?"

"Thou art clever in all things, fader. I remember me when thou bought our carriage horses. Many laughed at thee then, but in the end thou could laugh at them."

Then Rose lifted her face, full of inquiry, and glanced at the Captain; and he answered the mute question with unaffected pride—"Yes, yes, that is the truth. I saw the four horses, and my heart was sorry for them. Worn out were they, ill-used, hungry, uncared-for. For a few guilders I bought them. Then into my good stable they came. They were cleaned, they were comforted, they were fed on the best of corn and hay; and I visited them, and many kind words I said to them. Very soon they grew strong, and also so handsome that Justice Artaveldt is sick at his heart every time he sees them. What say you, Lady Rose, to this horse trade? For my part, I think it was a good one."

"Sure, sir, there could be no better. But why does it make Mr. Justice Artaveldt angry?"

"Because horses are his great passion, and he likes it not if any man have finer animals than his own. With many he has quarreled on this subject. I do not permit that he shall quarrel with me."

"But he has many fine horses, father, and Joris Artaveldt rides so that it is a great pleasure only to watch him."

"Of Arent I was talking, Virginia; of Joris Artaveldt I was not talking;" and at these words Arent, with his mother, came into the room. The girls smiled at him, each moving her chair a little, so that he could place his chair between them. As he walked forward, he stopped at his father's side, and laid his hand on his father's shoulder, and the look that passed between the men was better than a blessing.

"Arent, my son, how goes it with thee?"

"Well, my fader. And with thee?"

"All is well. And the ship? Has she done her duty? Has she behaved like a good ship? To New York why did thou bring her? In a queer temper is New York just now."

"For that reason I came for thy counsel. Will there be some fighting, I wonder?"

"Who can tell? Our rights we must have lawfully, if possible; lawfully with violence, if need be. So far went all our men of business last night; and so far they did not go without meaning to go further if—if—well, the 'if' is a big word. For my part, I will hope for the best; but if it come to the worst, a wise man will obey necessity—and I hope I am a wise man; yes, I hope so."

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

M. M. M., Santa Ana, Calif. Where the constitution of a society is silent upon the subject, may an absent member in good standing be elected to an office? I have heard it asserted that he could not, but can find no authority for the assertion.

Yes; the question of the presence of a member at the time of the nomination and election of officers has no bearing on the eligibility of a candidate, providing he is to return and is able to give the required amount of time to the discharge of the duties of the office.

A. R., Beaver Falls, Pa. 1. Please name, according to the time in which they lived, the kings and emperors who bore after their names the title "the Great." 2. Where is the Hall of Fame? 3. What are the capitals of Greenland and Iceland?

1. Three rulers have received and retained in subsequent ages the name of Great: Alexander the Great of Greece; Charles the Great, ruler of what is now France and Germany, crowned A.D. 800, and usually known as Charlemagne; Frederick the Great, King of Prussia. Others have been given the appellation by some partial historian, but subsequent historians have rejected the appellation. 2. The Hall of Fame is at New York University, New York City. 3. Greenland has no capital. Its population consists of Eskimos and a few Danes. The capital of Iceland is Reikjavik.

M. J. W., Waitsburg, Wash. 1. Is the vertical penmanship taught in the New York City and State schools? 2. How can explorers exactly locate the North Pole?

1. No; the Palmer system (sloping) is now taught. 2. This question has been answered by Professor Leland in a recent issue.

M. B., Germantown, Pa. Is the Church of Rome gaining or declining in strength in the European countries?

In France it has greatly declined. Less than forty years ago 30,000,000 were Catholics out of a total population of 36,000,000. To-day, the population is 39,000,000, of which it is said Rome claims only 6,000,000. In Italy, the northern provinces, with forty per cent. of the population, are in control of the anti-clericals. The southern provinces (which are the most illiterate) are still solidly clerical, and the central provinces are about evenly divided. Rome has also lost in Spain and Portugal. In England there is an apparent Romanist increase, and in Germany Rome is holding her own.

A Michigan reader (M. F. M., Detroit) sends this kind note: "Often I find so much comfort in the excellent sermons given in each number. There is such a variety of views, too, from all over the world I could not do without the weekly visits of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Your stories, too, are of such an elevating nature. Indeed, everything is so good. I try to give away as many as I can, that those who cannot afford to take the paper may have the benefit it affords."

L. H. S., Washington. 1. Are cash loans secured on real estate, or otherwise, taxable property in Colorado? 2. How are taxes affected in Colorado by non-available cash loans that are past due, and thereby debtors to the holder of the note?

1. The land which is security is taxed. Our understanding is that the loan thus secured is not taxed. 2. If holder of note is a non-resident, note is not taxable; if he resides in Colorado, the assessing officer would take the solvency or insolvency of debtor into consideration in fixing tax. These questions, however, involve too much knowledge of local law and custom to be answered safely by any hut a Colorado lawyer.

E. H., Carlton, Ore. Please explain Josh. 10:12-15.

This passage, describing the miracle of the sun and moon at the time of the battle in the vale of Ajalon, has been much discussed. Some commentators hold that it is a passage in which the inspired historian departs from his narrative to introduce a highly poetic quotation, in other words, a poetical figure of speech, not to be interpreted literally—as though one might say that "God and all nature fought on the side of Joshua." Again, the reference to the poetical book of Jasher as the source of this passage lends color to this explanation (see verse 13). Others prefer the literal view, regarding it as a miracle in which the hours when sun and moon were both visible (the sun on the heights of Gibeon at noon and the moon in the valley) were extended into a whole day or twelve hours of light (see Macdonald's Principia and the Bible), the continued radiance of both orbs lighting the battle ground. Still another interpretation is that the sun and moon were heavily obscured by storm clouds (see verse 11), and that Joshua's prayer was that they should withhold their light and that the gloom or semi-darkness of the storm might last until the battle was fought, giving the Israelites the advantage of a surprise with smaller numbers, the strength of which the enemy could not properly estimate.

A. H. N., Des Moines, Ia. In our Sunday School the question arose: Who first introduced the Christian religion in Italy, and at what time? Can you enlighten us?

Christianity was planted in Rome in the first years of the Christian era. Peter (according to some accounts) was in Rome A.D. 42, though this cannot be substantiated. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (about A.D. 55) shows that the Christian Church was then fully organized. The Neronian persecutions and those of Domitian (A.D. 60 to 96), while they caused the death of many Christians, strengthened the new religion, which spread until churches were opened at Milan, Ravenna, Lucca, Fiesole, Bologna, Naples, Syracuse, Palermo, Florence, and several other places, all of which are claimed to be of apostolic origin.

Mrs. A. D., Carmen, Okla. Why do nearly all the denominations put so much stress on the ordinances, when Paul tells us Christ nailed them all to the cross? (Col. 2:14, 20-22; Heb. 9:10.)

There is a growing tendency on the part of nearly all the Protestant churches to sink denominational differences in the interest of Christian unity. Of course, progress in such matters is slow, and it may be years before the true basis of a Christian union of the churches is realized. For all information regarding the scope and work of this movement write to Rev. Dr. Sanford, secretary Federation of Churches, Bible House, New York.

Mrs. C. H. K., Somers, Conn. 1. Who led Napoleon's army across the Alps? 2. At what place did they cross?

1. Napoleon led his army in person in its march across the Alps. 2. The passage was made in May, 1800. Napoleon collected his forces secretly near Lake Geneva. He led the main army by a sheep path across the St. Bernard. The other divisions marched through the Simplon, the St. Gothard, and other passes, into upper Italy.

D. E. D., Neenah, Wis. What is the meaning of the letters S. P. Q. R. on the front of the platform where the Roman judges sat, seen in paintings of Paul in Rome, and other Biblical pictures?

The letters S. P. Q. R. are the first letters of the words meaning the Senate and Roman People. In Latin, Senatus Populusque Romanus. The q is capitalized as it is a separate word, joined to the one preceding. The letters were placed on public buildings and on the standards of the Roman legions.

Reader, New York. What is the law in New York State concerning a second wife, who has no children, holding one-third of her husband's property?

A widow's rights are not affected by the fact that the husband was a widower when he married her. Just what the rights are depends on whether the husband left a will or died intestate, whether or not he had children by the first wife, and whether he left real estate or personal property, or both. All these things must be taken into consideration.

Miscellaneous

Mr. T. J. Jordan, of Cutcheon, Mich., writes this interesting piece of information, which may be serviceable in an emergency: "The Indian cure for snake bite is a strong tea made from the bark of the prickly ash. With this tea the parts affected should be bathed every two hours, and a little of the tea drunk. This effects a cure in a short time. The fluid extract of the prickly ash may be used diluted in water, as a substitute." We cannot vouch for this so-called remedy, which should be submitted to some practical physician before using.

AN APPEAL FOR A GOOD CAUSE

WE need your help—not on a large scale, but simply whatever you can contribute without sacrifice to yourself. Kind Providence may have prospered you during this year, but to some 1909 has been a Waterloo. They need your help, and we plead for them.

They are standing in the Bread Line of the Bowery Mission every night at one o'clock in the morning. It is their only "lunch," and it breaks their monotonous all-night tramp.

A little help now will put them on their feet again, and though they may never be able to thank you personally, some day they will pass your kindness on to some other unfortunate one and thus double your gift.

They need clothing as well as food. If you will help them, I will see to it that your gift—whether large or small—is conscientiously, wisely and economically administered.

Make some heart glad this holiday season, and you will make your own Christmas a happier one.

Give what you can spare, and may God bless you in the giving. Address Treasurer Bowery Mission, 100 Bible House, New York City.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

"When I landed last night, I thought to find the city at rest; but no, it was wide awake—the houses lighted, the women standing at the open doors, the men talking on the street, the youths—yes, and the school boys—parading in bands, singing——"

"To be sure! One may sing what they dare not speak—a song is a song, no more. I heard them, and I asked about it, for it is my way to ask when I do not know; and I was told they were verses that young Doctor Bogart had written. And while Bastian waited for me, he got them into his ears, and sang them all the time he drove me home—in this way they went"—and the old man tapped on the table lightly to keep the time of the lilt they were set to:

"King George is making our band
Too tight to the mother land;
Let him learn that wide we wear;
Let him learn that tight we tear.

"Not bad was the idea, so some room in my mind I gave it; but well I know, if Tim Bogart's father had heard Tim singing against the King, out of Trinity churchyard his ghost would have hurried, to pull Tim's nose for him; of that I am sure."

Rose at this remark laughed heartily. "Some day, Captain," she said, "I will tell the King that story. I will show him the city alight and awake at midnight, the women talking treason at the open doors, the men and the boys shouting Tim Bogart's verses on the streets, and old Mr. Bogart in his shroud hurrying out of Trinity churchyard to pull his son's nose for making up songs against the anointed king. How the King will laugh, and snap out his little interjections—'what! what! eh? eh? well! well! I should like to knight the old gentleman—but—but——' and so sadly shaking his head, His Majesty will turn away with a look of injury. For I do assure you, Captains both, that George the Third will not acknowledge that even dead Englishmen have gone beyond his power to reward or punish. Some day, my darling Virginia, you will be with me at Windsor Castle, and see this little comedy."

"That some day comes not for my daughter, Lady Rose. I say this kindly because it is the truth."

"Listen, Jan," interrupted Madame impatiently; "fifty different things have I to do, and thou wilt not get on with thy story. It is about the meeting last night we want to hear. Wilt thou tell us straight, or not? Who were present? Who were absent? What did they say? What did Jansen Van Vroom say? What will be done? Or is it all windy talk and passion?"

"Katrina, have I six tongues to answer six questions at one time? An impatient woman art thou, and Doctor Laidlie spoke the truth last night when he said, 'both the clergy and the women had driven horse and foot into this quarrel.' That is their way—I mean the women. In the Holy Scriptures thou may read that; Miriam, Deborah, Esther, Judith, meddling women all of them, and plenty more no doubt."

"Jan, who was chairman? Wert thou?"

"No! No! It is not Jansen Van Vroom's way to get into any place where other people's words can be counted to him. In my own chair I sit, but for two, three, ten hundred people I do not sit. Isaac Low was chairman, a good man, a rich man; he has a fine house on Dock Street——"

At this point Madame glanced at Arent, and he ceased playing with his sister's silks and looked at his father. With large free glances full of that collected stoical expression the old man knew and admired, he asked:

"Should not the Governor have been chairman, father?"

Then Rose, pushing Arent slightly with her elbow and laughing merrily, said, "Permit me to answer the Captain. In my hearing, Governor Colden called this meeting a devil's parliament. A man so learned, so pious, so loyal and royal, would have been taken with a fit of the apoplexy if invited to the chair of such a parliament. Nor would he, sir, have been in the humor to do anything you desire."

"Well then, my lady, men in such grim anger as were the merchants of New York last night were in the humor to do anything they desired, for themselves."

"Were there many people at the mecting, Jan?"

"The Tavern would not hold the half of them, Katrina, and we had to adjourn to the Exchange."

"Father," said Arent, "for many years I have heard men grumbling at England——"

"So? Yes. good reasons we have had to grumble. Whipped and driven to the last point we have been. First, there was the billeting of nearly three thousand soldiers on New York. Into barracks our homes were turned. Idle, insolent men loafed in our kitchens, used our horses and carriages, quarreled with our servants, or else made them as bad as themselves. And, Arent, when a grievance at a man's fireside sits down, very hard it is to bear. This was but the beginning of evil; bad was the billet, the impressment laws were worse. Any British man-of-war that wanted men could board our ships and take what number he desired; or he could land and kidnap our citizens, even off the streets of New York. You know, Arent, how it is?"

"Yes, father. I have been chased many times, but——"

"Never caught, Arent."

"Never once. What could their big, lumbering three-deckers do in a chase with the Manhattan? She knew when we put her in her finest dress of snowy canvas what she had to manage; and as soon as I took the wheel she would steal away like a cloud, and pass from the Englishmen's eyes like a dream. Or, if there was the luck of a fog on the horizon, she would cut it like a knife and hide herself behind a veil they dared not lift;"—and when Arent ceased speaking, both men were half-standing, their eyes far off, their arms outstretched, the spirit of the chase and the flight on them.

Rose and Virginia sat motionless, watching, full of interest. Madame was fretted and impatient. "The dinner will be one hour late," she murmured, "and then hurry and ill-temper. The meeting, Jan! Wilt thou not go on with the meeting?"

"Yes, Katrina, yes, I will go on very quickly. I was with Arent a few minutes on the sea, now I am again at the Exchange. This impressment law was the second grievance; the third cut at the root of everything—it was aimed at our judiciary. Always our judges had been commissioned 'during good behavior,' but when the excellent Judge De Lancey died three years ago, Chief Justice Pratt was appointed 'at the pleasure of the King.' So then no man would be judge longer than while he did what the King told him to do. What think you? Was it not an invitation to bribery and injustice? This change was coupled with an order to increase the salary of the chief justice. Black and angry were the faces of the assembly when it was read, and they told the Governor plainly, no salary at all would they pay unless the commissions of the judges were made during good behavior. And at this lawful anger Governor Colden in New York, and the Lords in London, were amazed and shocked at our undutiful and indecent opposition to His Majesty's just authority."

"But indeed, Captain," said Rose, "I do think George the Third means well; he has good intentions towards America. Upon my honor, I think these are mistakes of judgment—he has good intentions."

"If it comes to that, I take leave to say, Lady Rose, that mistakes make ruin in spite of good intentions—that mistakes will be punished without considering good intentions. For good intentions the world has no time. On the perish is everything in New York, and the King has good intentions! They are dog cheap! They end in smoke and lying! Fiddle-de-dee for his good intentions! A thousand pardons, my Lady Rose. Too good are you to understand the King's good intentions. Excuse my hot temper once; very rude it may be, but—but I cannot help it."

"La, Captain, your temper is delightful. I protest that I love to see a man zealous in a good cause. And you must know that I have heard at Governor Colden's and Mr. De Lancey's all the other side had to say for themselves. Indeed, I assure you, they talked more immoderately than you can conceive of. But even among the extreme royalists many protested against the 'writs of assistance.' And sure I have a world of anxiety on my own account, lest by such authority my box of clothes from London falls into the hands of these men who carry writs of assistance in their pockets."

"A pack of scoundrels are they! Writs of assistance! Three words of black lying. They are search warrants. And Grenville has ordered all civil, military and naval officers to assist the revenue officers in their dirty work. Well, then, how is it? Every naval captain in American waters can enter our harbors, and seize any person or cargo they choose to suspect."

"But, father," cried Arent, "such instructions are only threats. They will never be carried out."

"Think you so, Arent? Let me tell you they have jumped on American property like privateers after prizes—I mean not privateers who are honest men—of pirates I was thinking."

"In our own family, Arent," said Virginia, "for our cousin Jerome was quietly taking his ship into Newport, and a man-of-war saw her and he took her away from Jerome, and he took all her cargo away, and Jerome can get no redress;" and Virginia, with a movement of indignation, laid her folded arms upon the table, and looked with kindly sympathy at her father.

Captain Jan's face flushed crimson with passion. "Virginia speaks the truth, Arent," he said hoarsely. "It was the Vixen, Captain Harrowgate—a dog of a fellow! Confound his impertinence! Please excuse me, ladies, the words were red-hot, they burned my mouth. Yet while men were sore, skinned sore, smarting sore, under these wrongs, Grenville, the eternal fool, flings this stamped paper in our very faces! It takes our money out of our pocket without leave or license. It is highway robbery. It taxes everything we sell, everything we buy, everything we wear, everything we do. No Englishman would stand such an act, and though we be Americans, we are not short of the best men in England. No, I swear I won't pay a farthing for it."

At this moment the clock struck twelve, and Madame counted every stroke and looked reproachfully at her husband. "Thou may see how it is," she said, "ten, eleven, twelve o'clock, and little of thy story told yet. Now, then, it must wait; for the table is to set, and I know not if I can have time to make thee a pudding."

"Take the time, it is thine own say-so, but I like not to miss my pudding."

"To-day it is a roll full of damson jam, boiled."

"That is very good. See thou to it. My story will keep. To the stable I will go and talk a little to my four brothers. Give me some sugar for them, Katrina; they are good fellows."

"They eat more sugar than the household, Jan."

"Safely and handsomely they carry thee here and there, and so proud are they to carry thee."

"There, then! Tell them Katrina sent it."

"Good! Virginia, thou help thy mother. Lady Rose can come to the stable with me—if it is her pleasure."

"Sure, Captain, I would rather help forward the dinner. Upon my word, I also am a little anxious for the damson roll. We poor people of condition never have boiled jam rolls—and I like them."

Jan laughed, and the girls laughed and hurriedly put away their sewing; and Arent, a little reluctantly, accompanied his father. He said something very timidly about "helping" also, but Jan imperiously took him away. For Jan was undoubtedly a tyrant in his own home, his good tempers being if possible more despotic than his bad ones. However, the stable turned the trend of his thoughts, and the dinner time was, to Madame's relief, entirely given up to gastronomic and hippic conversation. These were safe subjects; they belonged to domestic affairs, and she knew only too well that public questions always touched quarreling and fighting and threats of pitiless war. And after dinner Jan wanted his little hour of quiet that was next door to sleeping.

He went to the long, back stoop for it, and Rose then said to Virginia, "Pray let us put on our new aprons, and walk between the box hedges in the front garden—it may be the prince of dreams will come riding by, and I have not had a civil thing said to me about my beauty for two days."

"A nice account you give of yourself, Rose."

"Faith, I know it; but I should be sweetly served if that handsome Lieutenant Artaveldt would join us—or your very agreeable brother. What would I give for a little company! Let me tell you soberly, your brother is one of the finest gentlemen I ever met—modest, too, I'll swear."

"He has a heart of gold, Rose."

"If I could steal it! If I could win it!"

"Poor Arent!"

"I am sure he is the perfectest character——"

"Why, then, here comes Arent."

"Alas, I run a strange hazard with such a man! I swear I could cry a little for myself. And yet I am not able to resist the temptation. In truth, I never could resist temptations; they are usually so agreeable to submit to."

In a few moments they were joined by the young sailor, who was wearing his handsomest uniform, and who seemed to have put on with it a commanding air that was very attractive. Rose looked at Virginia and shook her head. She wished Virginia to understand her expression, and negative motion, as indicative of surrender.

"You see how it is," she said softly to Virginia, and Virginia whispered, "I hope that Arent will say a few civil things to you."

"I will give him the opportunity, but will he take it?"

He did not take it, for as he walked between the girls he talked to them of the sea, and of the ships that go down to the sea. He told them how it looked on fine Sabbaths, when it was a blue wilderness, and the masts of the ships, far and near, were like church spires. He described a ship he had met coming out of the Arctic waters, weather-beaten but forging along, with all God's treasures of hail and snow.

A PREHISTORIC MONSTER

AN expedition sent out by the American Museum of Natural History to investigate the fossil beds of Montana has made several important finds. Mr. Barnum Brown, head of the Department of Vertebrate Paleontology, makes an interesting report of the discovery of the fossil remains of two prehistoric monsters. One of these, known to science as the triceratops, stood, when alive many thousands of years ago, five feet in height and had a measurement of fully seven feet from nose to tail. The restoration is shown in the photograph. Little is known of the triceratops, although some thirty individual specimens have been discovered by scientists. He is supposed to have been herbivorous—a huge, pig-like animal, with two or three horned protuberances on his snout, a round tail, padded, clawless feet, like those of the elephant, and probably a smooth, rubbery, dull-colored hide.

DR. ROBINOVITCH'S STRANGE EXPERIMENTS

ONE of the most remarkable series of experiments in recent years in the medical world has been made in New York, attracting the interest of physicians, men of science and the public, who for years have hoped for the discovery of some method or agency which would restore to health or life people who were in a state of coma or from whom apparently the last vital spark had fled, or those who had died of shock or other cause which had left the organs of the body intact. Of course electricity has been looked to by many as the agency by which this restoration of the life or the revitalizing of the human body might be accomplished, and the most remarkable advance in this direction has been made, not by some member of the sterner sex, to whom we have looked for important medical discoveries in the past, but to a bright young woman, Dr. Louise Robinovitch, who has heretofore carried on much of her work in Europe, making her headquarters at Paris, but who has recently come to New York to demonstrate her methods. Her demonstrations have brought forth both praise and criticism. The doctor did not use the human body in any of her experiments, but used animals as subjects. The animals were first apparently killed by an electric shock before she began her experiments, and this has caused some protest from people who rightly have the interests of our dumb animals at heart; but the animals suffered no pain, and all have been apparently as well as ever after "being restored to life." The experiments should not be in any way confused with the practice of vivisection, against which public sentiment is very strong, both in this country and in Great Britain.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, however, has had an agent at the demonstrations, but whether they will prevent the continuance of the experiments is not known at this writing.

Dr. Robinovitch is not a seeker after notoriety, and is much opposed to giving interviews to the press or having her picture published, as she claims that only trained scientists understand and that she could not explain it in a way to enlighten to any great extent the layman. She does not absolutely claim that the subjects were dead when she began to work over them, but it seems certain that they were in a state where there would never have been the least chance of their coming back to consciousness if her methods had not been applied.

The doctor received her degree from the University of Paris. She has continued her researches not only in Europe, but also in this country. She is the editor of the Journal of Mental Pathology, published in New York, and a member of the American Medical Association, the New York Academy of Medicine and the Medico-Psychological Society of Paris. She is short in stature, with pleasant, courteous manners. In speaking about the protest against her work she said to a representative of this paper: "I did the animals no harm, and I brought them back to life."

She gave her first demonstration at the New York Edison Company's building. A current of electricity was passed through a rabbit, and physicians declared that it was dead. The doctor placed points of electrical contact at the bottom of the spine and on the back of the chest. A current of fourteen volts was then passed through the body at intervals of two seconds. In three minutes, slight respiratory action was discovered, and the current was decreased. Heart action was next noticeable, and the current was switched off. The animal lay breathing easily for a few moments. In half an hour it was frisking about as if nothing out of the ordinary had occurred. A dog was the next subject, and the process was more complicated, but the result was successful. The doctor also showed that electricity could be used as an anæsthetic without the bad after-effects of chloroform or alcohol. A mild intermittent current was used to produce this result.

The electrical companies are much interested, as they hope to be able to revive employees who have apparently died of electrical shock.

It is said that in Paris the doctor revived a woman who had been pronounced dead. The woman was a morphine user, and being suddenly deprived of the drug she had apparently died from the effects of laying off its use at once. If this is true, the discovery of the young doctor will be a blessing to the human race.

NATIONAL MAGAZINE

I Know—

That I've only to get my magazine into the homes of the reading, thinking American people—to make them readers of the NATIONAL for good and always.

You will read my magazine to get and keep a close grip upon real happenings in the everyday life of our Nation.

The articles on "Affairs at Washington" are the most widely quoted that appear anywhere. Actual word-photographs of inside life at the Capitol, flash-lights of public men and the big National happenings, a unique and exclusive feature of the NATIONAL, first suggested by William McKinley.

But the NATIONAL MAGAZINE isn't Washington alone. Not by a long way; it is as big and broad as its name. Not heavy and deep, nor cold and stilted—but written in a friendly heart-to-heart style that glows and grips your attention from the first to last.

I want you to know the good things in the NATIONAL MAGAZINE, and I want you to have your choice of these two splendid gift books.

"HEART THROBS" the Old Scrap Book was compiled by 50,000 readers of the NATIONAL MAGAZINE sending me their favorite poems, sentiments—gems of real heart interest that had helped them in their daily lives and inspired them to better things. I paid $10,000 in cash for these contributions and found in them fabulous riches of helpful human thought.

"THE HAPPY HABIT"

Through all my life I have gone about with both eyes open for the bright, cheerful, do-your-heart good kind of things that happen on the brighter side of life. Best cure in the world for the blues—best 'livener of dull hours.

Both books are well printed and beautifully bound in gold and garnet—they are selling in the book stores for $1.50. But—

Send me $1.50 (regular price) for a year's subscription to the NATIONAL MAGAZINE and 50 cents additional and I'll send you, prepaid, either one of these splendid gift books, "Heart Throbs" or "The Happy Habit," and if you wish, I'll autograph the first 1000 books ordered.

acres of cranberries were growing. To increase their productiveness it was thought advisable to flood the meadows.

Through the meadows ran a large trout stream, and, when nine or ten years of age, I conceived the idea of damming the stream, ostensibly to increase the crop of cranberries, but chiefly for the purpose—that interested me more—of providing a fine place for skating, a sport of which I was especially fond.

Well do I remember my hard work through the October and November days that fall, in building the dam which later flooded not only my father's cranberry meadows, but a great number of acres adjoining.

One of the happiest days of my life was Christmas of that year, when the great glassy sheet of ice was alive with my schoolmates and companions, darting here and there, singing and shouting, all enjoying a New England skating party.

The Potato Doll in the Mining Camp

By Mrs. CYNTHIA WESTOVER ALDEN, President of the International Sunshine Society and Leader in Many Good Causes

IT was Christmas Eve in a mining camp in the Rocky Mountains, forty years ago. There were many men, but only one little girl. She was sitting in front of a fireplace, which occupied one whole end of "the best cabin in camp." Her seat was a flat piece of pine log. Lying close to her was a big St. Bernard dog.

"Miner Bob says that Santa Claus comes down the chimney; but now, Rover, we know better than that." She took hold of the dog's collar, and turned his head toward the fireplace. "Even if he should get down the chimney, he'd be burned up. He could not bring anything with him without getting it all black and dirty. I'll put the fire out to-night with that pail of water."

Rover got up and took a lap or two, and then came back and waited for the rest of the story.

She continued: "But I don't believe any Santa Claus will come away out here, where there is only you and me. How can his reindeers get over the gulch? If he did land on the roof, and saw that dirty chimney, he would go away again."

Here she stooped and whispered in the dog's ear. "We'll leave the window open. Of course, Rover, I don't mind telling you why I am so anxious for Santa Claus not to come down that chimney. You see, I want a doll. Miner Bob says that Santa Claus brings you what you wish for. I never saw real dolls, but they must be beautiful things. This picture I cut out of a magazine is a doll, so Miner Bob says. Whew! It mustn't come down the chimney, Rover, it mustn't."

In a few minutes the dog and the little girl were both fast asleep. This time the child's head was pillowed on Rover's shaggy coat and in her hand she tightly held an advertisement of Christmas toys.

Two men, sitting at a pine table in the other end of the cabin, were talking in a low, mysterious manner.

"We are 'most out of food, you know," said one; "only five potatoes left. We paid one hundred dollars for the last sack, but we could not get another sack for love or money. We have been snowed in now for three months, and we've got to count on four weeks more before there is any hope of getting out of here."

"Yes, I know it," replied his companion, "but I'm going to do it just the same."

"You know the boss' orders," spoke up the first man, who was Miner Bob. "We'll catch it if we disobey, especially when starvation is staring us in the face."

"I can't help it," was the reply, "put it all on me; I'll stand the blame."

The men drew their chairs closer together, and there they worked for several hours, stopping just long enough to lift the little girl from the floor to her cot, where she went on dreaming of Santa Claus and the beautiful doll.

It was a bitter cold night—a regular blizzard! Several miners lost their way going from one camp to the other and were frozen to death. Animals that failed to get under shelter were found dead next morning.

The little girl remembers no more of that most terrible storm in the history of the camp, but next morning she was awakened early by her father trying to close a broken window. He said it had been crushed in by the storm, but the little girl said, "No, Santa Claus did it."

"He's been here!" she cried, and in her excitement fairly rolled from her cot over the floor to the chimney. With cries of "It's a doll—a doll!" she clasped to her heart the most beautiful thing she had ever seen. "It's my doll, all mine; and it's got eyes, and a nose, and a mouth, and ears and hair—and such a beautiful red flannel dress!"

She kissed it again and again, and no heart ever came so near bursting with joy as the heart of that little girl, way out in the snowed-in mine, with death and starvation all about her.

The two miners had come in, and were listening to the wonderful story as it fell again from the childish lips.

"You used them all," interrupted the father, gazing sternly at the man.

"Yes," said Miner Bob, "we used them all."

"It was wrong, very wrong!"

"We could not help it," replied the other miner. "It was the only way to make it, and we'd rather go hungry the rest of our days than have the kid disappointed."

The "kid," oblivious of anything but the blessed joy of possessing a doll, was telling Rover: "Father thinks the wind broke the window. I forgot to open it; but, you see, Santa Claus knows just what you want, so he brought the doll through the window to save her from getting dirty coming down the chimney."

Little did she realize that of all the dolls found that Christmas morning in the stockings of the little ones all over the United States not one was made of as precious material as hers. She was clasping to her bosom the "only five potatoes in camp." They had been carved into "Miss Doll" by Miner Bob, and dressed in pieces of the only good red flannel shirt that the other man possessed.

Forty Christmas days have passed since then, and they have all been happy ones, but the peculiar and exquisite satisfaction I experience in pressing to my heart "my potato doll" has never been exceeded.

A Pleasure and a Joy

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I beg you to accept the thanks of myself and of my Sunday School for your generous kindness in receiving and entertaining our little children this summer at your delightful home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y. The children are a unit in calling their pleasure and joy there the "best yet." We are grateful for your courtesy and for your Christian charity, and we pray you and those contributing to accept our sincerest thanks.

Fighting a Good Fight*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN these days when there is so much of the debasing of God-given human strength in so-called prize-fighting, it is good to consider the deeds of a man who waged a spiritual fight that he might obtain "the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:14). Paul as a spiritual prize fighter declares that he wrestled not against flesh and blood, but against spiritual hosts of wickedness, even principalities and powers, Satan himself, and his emissaries (Eph. 6:12). "The beasts at Ephesus," who made an onslaught on Paul, were men possessed by the "powers," and from them God delivered Paul, so that he was afterward able to testify: "I am persuaded that neither life nor death, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38, 39).

There is in the National Museum in Rome an antique statue of the Dying Gladiator. It is best described in the lines of Byron:

I see before me the gladiator lie:
He leans upon his hand; his manly brow
Consents to death, but conquers agony;
And his drooped head sinks gradually low;
And through his side the last drops, ebbing slow
From the red gash, fall heavily one by one
Like the first of a thunder shower; and now
The arena swims around him; he is gone,
Ere ceased the inhuman shout which hailed the wretch who won.

We would contrast with the statue of the Dying Gladiator that treasure of art found in the catacombs of San Sebastian, in Rome—a picture of Paul being crowned by the Lord Jesus. Paul was the true dying gladiator. What did it signify that his head was severed from his physical body, when Christ crowned his spiritual body?

The consecrated cross I'll bear,
Till death shall set me free,
And then go home, my crown to wear,
For there's a crown for me.

Paul's Training

His training began when he did not know God's purpose in his life. Even his birth as a Roman citizen was a part of God's great plan. On several occasions the fact that he was a Roman citizen preserved his life to the furtherance of the Gospel. His education at the feet of the wise teacher Gamaliel prepared him to be the great orator and writer that he was.

His persecution of the Christians laid deep the foundations of sympathy in his soul, afterward to be used in their behalf, though apparently laid in opposition and hatred.

Paul's training as a tentmaker enabled him afterward to sustain himself as a preacher of the Gospel. The loss of physical strength for a while, as he was overcome by a Light from heaven and made blind for a season, made him strong in the Lord later on.

The coming of Ananias, sent by God as a brother to comfort him and to pray with him, prepared Paul to understand something about the sweetness of Christian fellowship.

The three years alone with Jesus, that Paul is supposed to have had in Arabia, to be compared with the three years when the twelve apostles were with Jesus while he was here upon earth, was his greatest preparation for the Christian life, and the preaching of the Gospel. But that period in Paul's life may not have been three years, as we reckon time, but only one year, with parts of two other years, according to the Jewish way of reckoning; but certainly at the end of that time he was "furnished completely unto every good work." He began his "good fight" by going first to Damascus to preach the Gospel. To go there was both brave and noble, as he had intended before his conversion that it should be the place of his greatest persecution of the Christians.

Paul's Career as a Fighter

It began in Damascus. He was withstood by the Jews, who lay in wait to kill him because he had left their ranks and joined the despised Nazarenes. Change of base was the better part of valor. Paul yielded to the importunities of Christians, who got him safely out of Damascus—by a basket let down from the wall. He proceeded to Jerusalem, another hotbed of hatred for such as he. There he attempted to join himself to the Christians, but they were afraid of him. They could not believe their former enemy had become one of them, but Barnabas the Good vouched for him, "took him by the hand, and brought him to the apostles." Most of all among the twelve Paul had desired to see Peter. Fifteen days Paul remained in Jerusalem, and preached in the very synagogues where there had been persecution against Stephen. He was a brave fighter, and did not desist preaching the Gospel of the Lord Jesus until Jesus himself appeared to him, saying: "Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem; for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me." But even at this the brave fighter was loath to go. He even tried to argue about it, and asked the Lord Jesus to remember how he had consented to the stoning of Stephen. "Depart; for I will send thee forth far hence unto the Gentiles" was the command then given and obeyed (Acts 22:17-21).

Paul was in the hands of his friends, Barnabas and other Christians, and they returned him to his home in Tarsus, via Cæsarea and Antioch. At Antioch, and in Syria and Cilicia, all along the way, he preached the Gospel. He was even then fighting the good fight.

In Tarsus there was fighting for him to do, because hitherto all of his associations there had been Jewish, and he would be regarded with special hatred by the Jews, having been educated and trained as a Jew. On the other hand, Tarsus was a place of great learning for the Romans, and as an apostle to the Gentiles Paul must of necessity come into conflict with philosophers and other wise men. Did he win out? It is supposed that Cornelius, the first Gentile convert, may have listened to the preaching of Paul, which would account for his desire to have the Gospel preached in his own house, and the gathering of his family friends, which Peter found when he was sent for by Cornelius. Cornelius had made considerable progress in the "Jesus way" when Peter came.

But Barnabas needed Paul's help in Antioch; the opportunity for the Gospel was great there, and there was also much opposition from the Jews to meet and overcome. Barnabas felt that Paul would be sufficient for those things, and he came to Tarsus to bring him to Antioch. Antioch was then the greatest and the worst of Greek cities under the Roman empire. Did Paul win out in Antioch? We must not give the victory all to Paul, for Barnabas had gone there before him, and other prophets and teachers are mentioned by name in Acts 13:1. But so mightily did the Gospel prevail in Antioch that at length, in three centuries, in the time of Chrysostom, one-half of the two hundred thousand inhabitants of Antioch were Christians! And let us not forget that the followers of Jesus were first called Christians at Antioch.

Farm Lien Securities

Interest, 6%

Among all the bonds that we handle, there are none so attractive to men who know, as Irrigation bonds.

These are among the reasons:

Irrigation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America.

The liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. The water immediately multiplies the land's value. The first crop from the land will usually pay the whole lien, and sometimes by several times over.

The liens are conservative. Bonds are rarely issued to more than one-fourth the land's value.

The liens are paid off in annual installments, so the indebtedness constantly decreases.

The bonds are additionally secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns. So we have a corporation, with large interests at stake, to guard against any delinquencies.

Some Are Municipal

Some Irrigation bonds are issued by organized districts, the same as School bonds. Such bonds form a tax lien on all the taxable property in the community. They form a high grade of municipal security.

Other Irrigation bonds are issued under the "Carey Act." Such projects, until they are completed and turned over to settlers, are under the constant supervision of the State Engineer and State Land Board.

Behind every Irrigation bond that we handle there is ample and ideal security.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest. That is a higher rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

The demand for irrigated land, because of its enormous fertility, greatly exceeds the supply. Irrigation projects are profitable; and, if rightly conducted, are free from risk. So there is great demand for money to help finance these projects, and six per cent. is paid to obtain it

$100—$500—$1,000

Irrigation bonds are issued in series, some due in two years, some in twelve years, some due every year between. One may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

They are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Irrigation bonds have become the most popular bonds that we handle. They are the safest six per cent. bonds that we know.

73 Issues Sold

In the past 15 years we have sold 73 separate issues of Drainage and Irrigation bonds, based on farm lien security. Not a dollar of loss has resulted to any investor.

We are now the largest dealers in bonds of this class. We have our own engineers and attorneys to pass on every detail. An officer of our Company constantly resides in the irrigated sections, watching the projects we finance.

Because of these facilities we get our pick of these bonds. There are very few issues which are not offered to us.

We have now written a book based on all this experience. It will give you a clear idea of all that pertains to Irrigation and Irrigation bonds. Every investor, small or large, owes to himself its perusal. The book will be sent on request.

January Investments

For January investors we have on hand 100 varieties of bonds. They include Municipal, Public Utility, Water Power, Corporation and Irrigation Bonds. Please ask for our list. Cut out this reminder so you won't forget.

Do You Gamble?

Some people spend their money and energy housing a splendid crop of grain, cotton or tobacco, and then gamble with Providence on its safety until sold. Do you?

Other people put the savings of years into a home and then rely on their luck to avoid the thousand-and-one chances of fire. Do you?

Still other people invest their entire assets in a store or a factory, and then wholly or in part insure themselves, thinking that they can carry the risk as well as the insurance company. Do you?

The average man has most of his property in one place. To carry his own insurance is to depend upon chance, i. e.: to gamble, with ruin as the penalty for losing. The business of the insurance company is founded on the law of averages. It can be safely conducted, but only when its stability is based on the experience of tens of thousands of risks widely distributed over a continental area.

The Hartford Fire Insurance Company offers unsurpassed indemnity. Its business is distributed among more than fifteen thousand cities, towns and villages throughout the United States and Canada. During 99 years it has paid every just claim—more than $125,000,000 in all. Its policies are safeguarded by ample resources and an honorable record.

The "Hartford" insures all classes of property. It also serves property owners by telling them how to guard against the dangers of fire. It has published a book on the subject with separate chapters for householders, merchants and manufacturers, that will be sent free to those who apply for it.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

In our time, we are used to seeing prize fighters of the baser sort go from place to place, to exhibit their prowess. Paul and Barnabas went together from city to city, through the island of Cyprus, and through Asia, showing others how they might win the prize of the high calling of God through the Lord Jesus. It mattered not to them that they were sometimes cast out of a city, or stoned outside the walls and left for dead, as in the case of Paul, for when he recovered he arose, and went again into the city. They were never forced to leave a city but they left some converts behind, and returned again and again to make more converts.

Then Paul went further into Europe, and still continued his work in the name of the Lord Jesus. Neither prisons nor shipwreck caused him to desist. He fought the good fight to the end, and when there was no longer any one to hear his voice, because he was in solitary confinement in the Mamertine prison, he finished what he had to say with his pen, and wrote words that have been ringing round the world ever since.

How We Can "Fight the Good Fight"

Would you be a fighter of Paul's type? Even while we are writing this lesson there is assembled a great Laymen's Conference on Missions in Washington. From some of the utterances made there we are convinced that they are getting ready to do a man's job in fighting for the Gospel. The chairman of the first meeting gave the keynote when he said: "We began in this country with the idea of conserving our national forests. It spread to include our national resources. We have now, with the same prudence and foresight, set out to conserve for the good of ourselves and future generations the moral conscience of humanity. Conservation of ethical resources is no less important than conservation of material resources, and likewise is the movement of us laymen in promoting Christian religion and civilization spreading over the world. To preserve our civilization we must use every effort to spread the kingdom of Christ to every corner of the earth."

President Taft spoke of missionaries as "the outposts of civilization." He laid at the feet of the missionaries "the inspiration which started the great forward movement in China to-day." Another speaker, Dr. Grenfell, said: "Money alone is not enough for successful missionary work. You can't buy the souls of people. To win a man's soul is at the price of your willingness to pay the cost that Christ was willing to pay. The only successful way to uplift mankind is the way that Christ taught."

The conservation of ethical and Christian forces must be accomplished by consecration if we are to win out in the good fight. It is a sweet expression of Bernard's, "As whatsoever we give unto thee, unless we give ourselves, cannot satisfy thee; so whatsoever thou givest unto us, Lord, unless thou givest thyself, it cannot satisfy us."

But some persons there are who have not yet discovered the meaning of consecration. At a town council they were discussing the advisability of consecrating a portion of a new cemetery. A member suggested it would be a very good idea to consecrate the whole of the cemetery. "I had my back yard consecrated, Mr. Mayor, and it has worn well." That man was strangely mixed on concreted and consecrated. And also it is one thing to consecrate a place for the dead and quite another thing to consecrate life. The word "homage," which we often use in our worship, is from the Latin homo, a man, taken from the phrase with which a subject duke expressed his loyalty to his "overlord": "Devenio vester homo"—I become your man. Can we say that we have become God's men and women? And do we bring him our grateful homage in word and deed? The life of the apostle Paul was so fully consecrated that he could say: "One thing I do," and that was to serve the Lord Jesus.

Some dishonest men have a method of taking a part of the gold away from a coin without disfiguring it. It is called "sweating the gold." After this subtraction of value, the coin often passes for months without its diminution in value being recognized. In the Bank of England each gold coin is passed through a machine that weighs each piece, and marks with a deep cut those that are deficient, throwing them into a box by themselves, from which they are sent to the mint to be remade, the deficiency being charged up to those who brought the coins. Ananias and Sapphira, in withholding a part of the price when they made their offering to God, were like such coins. They would have passed for years among men as noble and generous, but God saw the "sweating" and marked them with the stroke of death.

The young ruler who came to Christ would have passed for a most perfect self-offering in the eyes of men, but Christ weighed him and found that much of his heart was kept back with his gold, and he marked him also as deficient, with the words, "One thing thou lackest." What a sad contrast in these characters with the full-weight consecration of Paul! How is it with your character and mine?

Let us consider the Jewish sacrifices, and so gain a clearer idea of what it means to become God's man. The thought before the mind of the worshiper was a broken covenant. Sin had driven man from Paradise, and put a chasm between him and the God with whom he had before talked face to face. With the broken covenant in his thoughts the worshiper brought, first of all, the sin offering, some slain lamb or other animal, and laid it on the altar as the symbolic prayer for forgiveness and atonement. The covenant being thus restored, the worshiper next brought in confirmation of it the whole burnt offering of consecration, or self-dedication. It must be a perfect, living animal, "without spot or blemish," its death afterward being only an incidental part of the sacrifice to show its completeness, to say for both animal and worshiper, "living and dying, we are the Lord's." This was followed by the thank offering, in which the worshiper gave back to God some of the best first fruits he had given to him.

Isaiah speaks of the heartless sacrifices of his people and calls for Christian living as an offering upon their altars. "Cease to do evil, learn to do well," etc. (Isa. 1:16, 17). Micah, in the name of the anxious disciple, asks what offering is to be brought to the Father, saying: "Wherewith shall I come before God?" And then he answers: "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth Jehovah require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?" This offering is complete when we can say as Christ did in his sacrifice of obedience: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work" (John 4:34).

The Small Investor

"SUPPOSE you were a resident of some small town or village far removed from the investment centres, and you were the possessor of a sum of money, large or small: In what would you invest it and how would you go about it?"

So many subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have asked this question in substance that we have thought best to ask it of several well known banking institutions, with a view to obtaining opinions that might assist our friends in reaching a decision. And the composite answer, stated as simply as possible, is as follows:

Buy bonds, or some similar form of certificate, amply secured, of a banking concern whose integrity is unimpeachable.

It is not so long ago that the large bond houses disregarded the existence of the small investor entirely. Most of them seemed to care only for what is known as institutional business, the demand for large blocks of securities by trust companies, banks, etc. The small investor, with his call for only one or two bonds, did not seem to be worth while catering to. Then one or two houses awakened to the fact that the small investor, in the aggregate, is capable of absorbing more bonds than all the trust companies combined; that he, in fact, constitutes the great body of the saving public, the real financial backbone of the nation.

Power of the Small Investor

The popular periodicals in which the bankers advertised, realizing in turn that their attitude in the matter was of the greatest importance to the general prosperity of their subscribers, began a process of elimination on their own account. They began slowly to weed out the vender of worthless securities, or to insist upon having evidence of his ability to make good his promises.

Most of them refuse advertisements of stocks entirely, confining themselves to bonds or similar securities, whereupon the question arises, Why bonds alone? Are there not some gilt-edged stocks which always yield a profit? Do not the richest men in New York own large blocks of stocks of railroads and other corporations? Are there no safe securities other than bonds?

In answering these questions the circumstances of the intending investor must always be kept in view. If he were one of those richest men, with the concentrated resources of a great fortune at his command, the line need not be drawn so sharply, since his very environment would provide him protection. But the small investor, he of the farm, or the village, or the small town, far removed from contact with financial centres, has none of these resources of observation. He must depend upon buying outright some form of security that has the least chance of being affected by outside influences. This condition seems best encompassed in the bond. The kind of bond will depend upon the advice and integrity of the banker who sells it, but in form at least the bond would seem to be the character of security to buy by virtue of what it guarantees.

What Is a Bond?

A bond, according to the definition in the text-book, generally acknowledges that the railroad, or other corporation, issuing it owes a certain sum to the owner of the bond, payable on a fixed date. It also stipulates a rate of interest, and the intervals at which this interest must be paid. It should mention the property pledged as security for the payment of the principal and interest. Railroad bonds are usually pledged by the President and Treasurer of the Railroad and by the Trustees, to whom most bonds are made out, and who must defend the rights of bondholders should the Company fail to meet any of the obligations it undertook in the mortgage deed.

In other words, a bond is the Corporation's promissory note for the money originally paid for the bond by the investor, with interest for the same, to be paid to the investor in stated amounts at stated intervals; and to guarantee its good faith in the matter the Company pledges the bondholder an interest in certain properties in its possession. It follows that a bond has a first call upon the property rights of the Corporation; that it represents something tangible; that it pays a definite amount of interest and that it may be redeemed at its full value at a certain time.

What Is a Share of Stock?

On the other hand, let us define a share of stock. A share of stock is a certificate of interest in a corporation; and a corporation, to quote again from the financial primer, is "an entity existing in contemplation of law, authorized to conduct certain business in the same manner as a natural person." In other words, a corporation is an association of individuals, much the same as a church, in which each member is a partner. The degree of each member's partnership is determined by the number of shares of stock owned by him, and the amount of his influence in the management of the business is proportioned in the same manner. Each share of stock carries with it the power of one vote, and the owner of a majority of shares has the most say in the affairs of the Company, and, right or wrong, his will can prevail. If the business is conducted at a profit, the majority in interest can vote a dividend to the shareholders, or they can apply the earned money to the extension of the business, but if this dividend is passed, or omitted, it follows that the shares yield no profit. It is all in the power of the largest shareholders.

However, as the bond depends for its security upon the value of the property pledged for it, the inexperienced bond purchaser should ascertain every possible fact concerning such pledges. After all, he or she is the person to be satisfied, and no reputable bond house will demur at being asked intimate questions concerning the Company issuing the bonds, where it is, how long it has been in business, the life of its franchises, its earnings since it was incorporated, the probability of increase in its business, why it issued the bonds, the property pledged for them, etc.

Be Sure of Your Banker

If the reputation of the house advertising the bonds is irreproachable, you can take much of the above for granted, because bond houses of first-class reputation cannot afford to issue bonds without having investigated their reliability in every way. In fact, the investigation process is an expensive part of their organization. On the other hand, if you are not sure of the house advertising the bonds, then there can be no offense in demanding some evidence of its integrity. Its advertisement, in fact, invites your correspondence, and you may ask concerning its reputation, whether it is sure of its facts, whether its investigation of the property was personal, what other bonds of this nature it has sold, and what has been the result. Are the securities negotiable? Can they be sold again, or can you obtain a loan upon them for, say, eighty per cent. of their value? Misfortunes happen in the best regulated of families, and the time may come when you will need the ready money. If these suggestions are followed out, there should be very little difficulty or uneasiness in making a purchase of bonds.

CALLED HIGHER

William Bioren Coolidge, a reader of this paper, passed away recently. His aged and sorrowiog mother sends us these verses, written by him shortly before his death:

HIS BIDDING

Would I might sing some little song, to touch each human heart;
Aod by its charm to eoter io, and never more depart.
There with its message sheltered from the cold world's wintry blast,
To sing for aye its sweet refrain, "I've found my home at last!"

And may its music make each desert beart a garden fair,
Where no flower bloomed, but only weeds of selfish love were there;
His message io my song would ever waft o'er land and sea:
"As ye have done it to the least, ye did it unto Me."

Mrs. S. D. Tysoo, of Shuqualak, Miss., passed to her heavenly home June 17, 1909.

Mrs. W. B. Eady, of Horton, Ontario, died recently. She was a lover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

In Portland, Me., Mr. William C. Rideout has been called to his heavenly home, aged sixty-three years.

Mrs. Charlotte L. Hamlin passed to her heavenly rest Juoe 21, at Oak Park, Ill., io the sixty-third year of her age.

Dr. H. J. Hughes, of Muskogee, Okla., passed into the higher life some time ago. He was a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for twelve years.

Mrs. E. M. J. Thomas, of Milton, Wis., fell asleep in Jesus September 23, 1909, in the sixty-eighth year of her age. She had been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for over fifteen years.

Mrs. S. Angie Berryhill, of Spring Valley, O., laid aside all earthly cares almost one year ago, having been a subscriber and faithful reader of this paper for almost thirty years.

Mrs. Elizabeth Glass Grant, of Millers, N. Y., entered into rest at her home on June 5, 1909. She was in her eighty-fourth year, and had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years.

Jacob Holm, of Cantoo, O., passed away recently, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. He was a true Christian, loyal to his church and God. He joined the United Brethren Church at fifteen years of age. He loved to read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Mary Todd died at her home in Clifton, O., July 31, aged seventy-seven years. She was a constant subscriber and reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for over twenty years. She was a devoted Christian, and her door and her heart was open to every one.

Mrs. F. J. Tiffany, of Chapin, N. Y., has entered ioto rest, aged eighty-five years. She was a life-long member of the Presbyterian Church of Canandaigua, N. Y., and took great interest in church work. She had heen maoy years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Ruth Pennels Talhurst died August 6, at her home near Rushland, Mich. She was born August 18, 1824, in Sussex, England, and came to America early in life. She lived some time in Buffalo. N. Y., moving later to Michigan. She was a faithful member of the Methodist Church.

James Fleming Greenlee, of Hutchinson, Kan., entered into rest on the 30th of June. Mr. Greenlee was born in Ohio, where he eolisted, in youth, under the banner of Christ and also in the "hundred-day service" for his country in the war. Soon after, he settled in Iowa, where he was a member of the Senate for two terms. Later he removed to Kansas, where he was a member of the Legislature. He was seventy-one years of age.

Mrs. Emmelioe H. Wiggin died on October 10 in Mount Vernon, Me., at the age of ninety-seven years, well known as the oldest person in all that section. Her best claim to distinction was her fine Christian character. For eighteen years she drew comfort and inspiration from the weekly visits of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

After an active and useful life covering a period of seventy-five years, Mrs. Stephen P. Wadsworth, of South Hero, Vt., went to her long rest on the afternoon of October 11, 1909. From childhood she had been a conscieotious Christian. She prized the privilege of being numbered among THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. Mrs. Stephen P. Wadsworth was born August 9, 1834. She leaves a husband, four sons and three sisters to mourn her loss.

Mrs. A. R. Wheat, of Valley Spring, Calif., was called from earth May 3. She was born March 2, 1824, near Cooerville, Union County, Iod., and removed with her parents to Iowa in 1836; was married to Alexander Reid Wheat October 24, 1839. She crossed the plains to Califoroia in 1853, and in 1854 settled near Valley Spring. She was the mother of five children; three besides the family of a deceased son now survive her. A kind and loving mother; ever a bright smile of welcome to all; ready to assist in times of sickness and trial and in charity. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church and a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a number of years.

Paul's Faith in God

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

PAUL'S career was one of continuous trial and struggle. In Damascus, where he first preached the Gospel, the enemy stirred up the Jews whom he had "confounded" by his witness to Christ; and they took counsel to kill him. As soon as his call to initiate foreign missionary work began, the enemy began to withstand him; first by Elymas the sorcerer, one of Satan's tools in Cyprus; but the man of faith conquered, the Lord working with him. And then he began a long series of missionary work in Asia and in Europe, comprising three missionary journeys, founding churches in many cities, where he generally commenced in the Jewish synagogues. But he always ended by suffering persecution, which the enemy of souls stirred up. He fought on, not by human effort, but by "the good fight of faith," which he recommends to Timothy, and this does not mean human energy, but standing still to see the salvation of God. The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace."

"I have finished my course," wrote this man of God. It was a wonderful life of faith in and obedience to God, not turning aside to the right hand or to the left, but as Solomon taught: "Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee. Ponder the path of thy feet, and let all thy ways be established. Turn not to the right hand nor to the left, remove thy foot from evil." Such was the course which Paul had finished. There were no vain regrets; all which had to be made right with God had been made right at the time; there were no running accounts in his life, he kept short accounts with God; for, as he says: "I do exercise myself to have always a conscience void of offense toward God and toward man." And such a course should be, and may be, that of every child of God who trusts and obeys him. Paul was true in the start, all along, and up to the end.

"I have kept the faith." This is not the testimony of some theologian jealous for the doctrines which he holds, and ready to contend with any who differ from him. With Paul faith was the breath of his new life. Faith meant to him unbroken communion with God, unbroken appeal to God, and obedience to him. He walked by faith, not by sight. His whole career as a child of God was expressed in his words: "The life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who died and gave himself for me."

Thus, as a prisoner in his arrest he could trust his God, who permitted it, and who knew how far he could afford to have this instrument thus stopped in his work. In the plot against him, he saw God's hand in sending his nephew to tell him of it; and knowing from God that he had to bear witness of him in Rome, he could trust God to carry him there.

We have seen how, as a prisoner on board ship, this man who had God dwelling in him could not be hid. Knowing that God meant him to reach Rome, he could not fear for his life as those around him did, and so on board ship as elsewhere he fought a good fight, he continued his course, he kept the faith, and every man on board that ship knew far more about God than he ever knew before through this man who trusted in him. The shipwreck had no more fears for Paul than had the storm, so long as God was with him; Paul was at home in all circumstances, and, like oil when mixed with water, the man of God always came to the top, and became practically the master of the situation. What a lesson for us all that in our lives it is the will of God, and to the glory of God, that we also should fight the good fight, pursue our course, and keep the faith!

The Christmas Bells Are Ringing Still

1. Peace and good will! Peace and good will! The Christmas bells are ringing still, mp
As once they rang upon the height Where shepherds wateh'd, that wintry night—
Long years a - go! Ah, sweetly, sweetly do they chime, In notes of rapture rit.
so sub-lime, That thro' our hearts their echoes thrill Peace and good will!
good will!

Copyright by The Biglow & Main Co.

Now soft and low, now soft and low,
We hear the liquid numbers flow,
And slowly, sweetly rising high,
They meet with those beyond the sky,
In joyous swell!
Till hearts below and hearts above
United are in bonds of love:
And richest dews of grace distil
Peace and good will!

This holy chime, this holy chime
Renews the song of olden time,
When all the midnight clouds gave way
To usher in the glorious day,
So long desired:
O bells, ring on! and spread through earth
The tidings of the Saviour's birth,
Till mortals everywhere fulfil
Peace and good will!

LABORERS IN THE VINEYARD

—THE MISSIONARIES in Asia Minor report that there are 80,000 needy Armenians and at least 5,000 orphans in that country to-day as the direct result of the late massacres. The Adana Relief Committee, G. H. Godson, secretary, 301 West 114th Street, New York, is preparing a shipment of ten cases of clothing to be forwarded to Adana.

—EVANGELISTS DAVIS AND MILLS conducted a union campaign at Sherburne, N. Y., during October, which was the most successful ever known in that section. A large tabernacle was erected. Scores of conversions occurred and the effects of the revival were felt throughout the Chenango Valley. These workers are engaged in a similar campaign at Oxford, N. Y.

—MISS EVA L. MACKRELL, superintendent of the Chinese Sunday School at Ocean Grove, N. J., writes a lengthy letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, defending the Chinese against the charges made in the recent discussion concerning "the single scholar system." This subject has already been pretty thoroughly canvassed on both sides.

—MR. A. M. PIPER, of Des Moines, Ia., writes: "Our Rally Day programme for our Sunday School, October 24, illustrated the principle that the Sunday School is a manufacturer of Christian citizens. We had a representation of a large factory decorated with flags on the wall of the Sunday School room, and our attendance that day was over 500, the largest in the history of our school. Albert B. Cummins, United States Senator from Iowa, was our leading speaker."

—THE NATIONAL BIBLE INSTITUTE of New York announces another advance step. It has opened a new Gospel hall at 111 Manhattan Street, Harlem, where evangelistic meetings are to be held every night in the year. The hall is in the centre of a crowded population. Don O. Shelton, president of the Institute, says: "The purpose is to open Gospel halls as rapidly as possible in neglected sections of the city. We believe multitudes now out of the churches can be reached with the Gospel through these halls."

—DR. SMILEY, of Denver, has united the churches of Akron, Colo., in a series of union revival meetings, that promises to bless all the churches of Washington County. After several days of prayer and preaching directed to the church, signs of spiritual life appeared. On the eighth day the evangelist gave an invitation to the unsaved and forty bowed at the mourners' bench. Among these were heads of families, many young men from the ranches and several pupils from the high school. One godly mother was rejoiced to see her six stalwart sons come forward and publicly confess their Saviour. Eighty-four converts confessed Christ in four days.

—STAMFORD, N. Y., has a somewhat novel organization of the clergy, known as the C. C. C. (Clerical Club of the Catskills). Its range includes villages along and adjacent to the Ulster and Delaware Railroad, from Pine Hill eastward to Meredith westward. The C. C. C. is interdenominational. It includes Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, a Congregationalist, a Dutch Reformed and a Hebrew. The organization was instituted last March, and the club meets bi-monthly. At a recent meeting the leading exercise was for each member to present within one hundred words his definition of a Christian, the approved one being that presented by Rev. Ninian B. Remick, D.D., of Pine Hill, as follows: "A Christian is a disciple of Christ, the law of whose life is the law of love, the rule of whose conduct is the Colden Rule."

You can place money in the Industrial Savings and Loan Company, and know that it is safe, and is where you can obtain it when wanted, and will yield four cents per day for every dollar invested. See their advertisement on page 1067, and write them for full information.

Our Business is the manufacturing of canvas gloves and mittens. The demand for these goods has increased by jumps and bounds, way beyond our ability to manufacture them. For that reason we are compelled to look for outside assistance and are willing to help others, who are willing to help themselves, to get a start in this business. There is room today for ten canvas glove factories where we have one now. Start a factory with our help.

Our interesting Book which we send Write for it. FREE

Immense Profits are made in this fascinating business. The McCreery Brothers started only a few years ago without a cent. Today they have thousands of dollars, own their own large factory, have interests in others, and do an enormous business. They have started a few other men and women in the glove business and they will help you to start too, furnishing you with the necessary equipment for starting free, and teaching you the secrets of the business.

Unlimited Demand There is no class of goods for which there is such a steady demand as for canvas gloves and mittens. Everybody uses them—the farmer the mechanic, the doctor, the lawyer, the merchant, the laborer—in every section of the country—from Maine to California and from Minnesota to the Gulf.

Opportunity is Knocking at Your Door

Millions of Pairs of canvas gloves are being sold. Somebody is getting the profit on these goods, why not you? Come with us and let us start you in this profitable, legitimate business, which with a reasonable amount of light work and attention should make you a prosperous factory owner in a short time. Each member of the family can help—father, mother, son and daughter can each do their share and as the business grows and develops help can be obtained on the outside. It is to your personal advantage, to the advantage of your pocket book to learn all about this wonderful offer we are making. All you need is the use of an ordinary sewing machine. We supply the other necessary equipment without cost. No matter how small or how large your town; no matter what section you live in, there is always room for a factory. You can start at home or in a small store room near by. You can work all or only part of the time and can engage others to work for you.

Here is a Chance where you can start on an honorable career as a successful business man or woman. You cannot possibly lose anything by investigation, and it may mean financial success to you. Do not delay. Today the opportunity is open to you; tomorrow may be too late. Our ability to assist others in starting factories is limited to our ability to furnish them with raw material, and just as soon as enough have become associated with us to absorb our capital we shall be obliged to withdraw this offer. It is so very easy to get the full details of our proposition. Simply sign and send us the coupon. Write your name and address plainly.

Leavening the Lump*

IN a powerful sermon Dr. Joseph Dunn Burrell enlarged recently upon the astonishing confidence of Christ when he said: "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

Here was a poor, obscure carpenter, modest, uneducated except in the rudimentary way in which Jewish boys were taught in those days (girls were seldom taught, except in music and dancing); living in a small province of the Roman empire, having apparently no warrant for his extraordinary assertion; and yet affirming that he was to be lifted up, and that then he should draw "all men"—the whole world—unto him.

Mark the marvelous way in which this prediction has been fulfilled. This little leaven—the doctrine dropped by a humble Palestine preacher during only three brief years of ministry—has leavened the whole earth. The Bible, especially the New Testament, the Messiah portion, has infused a new and nobler life into this wicked old world. The countries which lead in science, art, philanthropy, literature, are those which are nominally Christian, and in which the Bible is open for the reading of all—England, Germany, the United States. And the wider open is this New Testament the more civilized is the nation. The freer religion is made there, the better a nation becomes. Freedom, perfect freedom, in religion, as in everything else, "freshens most and fullest feeds the soul."

The force of this leaven is noted especially in the estimate which is placed upon woman. Many of our profoundest philosophers assert that the touchstone of civilization in any country is the status of its women. That nation which best educates and most highly regards its women is the greatest and most powerful. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has recently noted in one of its news articles, Japan is finding this out, and its leading men are saying, "We must better educate our girls. We must have a double standard, instead of a single standard as heretofore, when we have considered only men as necessary to build up our power."

This is a natural consequence of the great awakening of this island kingdom. Preparations are now making there, as in no other Oriental country, for the education of their girls.

The culture of a man is as readily tested in this same way. The men who dig our ditches and cellars are almost a unit in their scorn of womanhood. They consider women as the servants and inevitable inferiors of men.

The truly cultivated man is very different, and the extent of his culture, again, like that of a nation, can be gauged by his attitude toward the education and freedom of womanhood.

No Christ-leaven has penetrated the enormous sophism which is called Mohammedanism. Uncounted millions of men, including some whole nations, adhere to this religion, in which womanhood is degraded almost beyond belief. The position of these nations in the scale of civilization is among the lowest. It is computed that eighty per cent. of Mohammedans cannot read their boasted Koran, in which, joined with many noble and beautiful sentiments, are imbedded many of the vilest and most contemptible. Yet this little leaven of Galilee shall, in God's good time, leaven even the corrupt lump of Mohammedanism.

Our Christmas Gifts*

AMONG the many inspiring thoughts which have been brought forth by this greatest of our festivals, never should be forgotten those of Robert Browning, in his "Christmas Eve."

This work contains twenty-two long stanzas, and is among the most involved and confused in expression of all the many involved and confused productions of its great author, while its rhymes are often labored and grotesque; but behind the strange verbiage lies, as ever with this great writer, noble and Christ-like thoughts, and here and there shines out a lucid line which will live forever.

In the poem, a critical and cultivated Englishman stumbles one rainy night into a chapel where the poor worship. One by one the congregation file in—deformed, diseased, vulgar, ill-odored, and some with the marks of an evil life written plainly upon them. The minister begins his sermon. It is badly delivered, incorrectly written, illogical, dogmatic, and utterly displeasing to the critical visitor. So, as he says,

> I flung out of the little chapel.

The rain had stopped. The moon was rising. He walked on, still fuming, but yielding somewhat to the charm of the stillness and the fresh air. He began to think over the scene which he had just left, and reproved himself for the severity of his judgments upon it. As he thought, he saw that love had been there, and he admitted, with Drummond, that that was "the greatest thing," and that

> The loving worm within its clod,
> Were diviner than a loveless god
> Amid his worlds.

Suddenly a moon-rainbow, a double one, flashed on his sight, and with it he seemed to have a glimpse of a blazing glory, and "a sweepy garment, vast and white," showed him that he was in the presence of God himself. In an instant he sees his full sin in despising the humble, loving worshipers that he has just left, and he hastens to ask forgiveness.

As he pours out a flood of repentant words he seems to be caught up, even as St. John, into this great white garment, and whirled over the world until he is dropped before a vast Romish church, where multitudes of men are worshiping. As they praise God, earth breaks up, and in flows heaven upon them. Error is there, but through it shines the everlasting Gospel.

Still holding to the hem of the great garment, he is lifted again, and is set down in a German town, where "a hawk-nosed, high-cheekboned professor," mild, pure, but wholly intellectual, is preaching on Christmas Eve. He begins to dissect Christianity, its origin, its proofs, all coldly and impersonally, until

> The pearl of price, at reason's test,
> Lay dust and ashes levigable
> On the professor's lecture table.

Yet he bids his flock go home and love the Man whom he has analyzed, and model their lives upon his.

He goes again to the little chapel, and does not mind the lacks that he finds there. The "posturings and petticoatings" of the great Romish church offend him no more. The husk which the German professor fed his flock becomes fruitful—for the Englishman sees that, through all, Christ becomes "confessed as the God of salvation," and love, love, love is made manifest.

It is the vital lesson of the Christmastide—the love which prompts our mutual gifts—the love that is a reflection of the "love divine, all love excelling," that gave a life for us, and that shall grow clearer to our vision until the millennium of universal love shall dawn.

The Christmas Bible

By Pauline Grace Hunt

MANY years ago a family in ill-health left Connecticut for California. All furniture was sold. Only a few paintings, keepsakes, bedding and the family Bible were retained, and these were packed in a box and shipped via the Isthmus of Panama, as all freighting was done then.

After the arrival of the family in San José, Calif., times were very close with them and many months passed before the eldest son, the chief support of the family, could spare the means to pay the charges on the box. When he finally called and inquired after it he was told that the contents had been sold at auction, and no information could be obtained as to who had been the purchasers.

It was then nearing the holidays, and he had expected to have the box home by Christmas. The family grew sick at heart when this sad news was given them. The son was then canvassing the country, selling a certain farming implement. His way led him to a small cabin in the foothills. Here he was welcomed and invited to dinner. After the meal the rancher turned to his little son, and said:

"Go, son, and bring me the big Bible. We'll have a chapter."

Soon the boy appeared, struggling with the big book. When the young man's eyes fell upon the book he recognized it as the long lost Bible. The muscles around his heart tightened and a lump came in his throat.

"May I ask you where you got your Bible?" he inquired in a quavering voice.

"Certainly, sir. I bought it for one dollar at an auction sale. We are all proud of it, as it is the only Bible we've had since we have been keeping house."

"I can tell you every word written on the family record page in that Bible and give you every date accurately," said the young man confidently, and he proceeded to do so. He also gave the man a description of each lock of hair which was tied with ribbon on one of the blank pages. Then he told the story of their leaving their Connecticut home and his father's poor health. At the end of the story his arms sought the table and his head fell upon them while sobs shook his frame. The rancher and his wife both shed sympathetic tears, then the man went up to the boy and said kindly:

"Take the Bible home to your father, boy. It will be a Christmas present."

"But I will pay you what you paid for it at auction."

"No, no. I have my reward in your appreciation."

With stammering tongue he thanked the man and hurriedly departed. Some hours later the Bible was placed in his father's lap, while he sat dozing in his arm-chair. The weight of the book soon roused him.

"What, am I dreaming?" He sat up and rubbed his feeble eyes with palsied hands. "Has the Lord answered my prayer, and sent me my dear old Bible?"

"He has, dear father, he has," replied the son.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Songs of Christmas-tide

THE Book of Christmas. Introduction by Hamilton W. Mabie. The prose and verse contained in the twelve parts of this book are collected from the best that has been written on the subject in ancient as well as modern times. The Christmas festival, dear to the heart of sixty generations, as Mr. Mabie cleverly says, "has survived the commercial uses which it has been compelled to serve. It has survived the cynical spirit which distrusts sentiment and sneers at emotion. It has survived that preoccupation with affairs which leaves little time for feeling." Christmas carols are still sung, and the glow of love which bears fruit in a forest of Christmas trees, with mobs of merry children shouting around them, is found not only in our land, but in the lands across the sea. We quote one of the quaintest of all the old English songs:

The Holly and the Ivy,
Now both are full well grown;
Of all the trees that spring in wood,
The Holly bears the crown.
The Holly bears a blossom,
As white as lily flow'r;
And Mary bore sweet Jesus Christ,
To be our sweet Saviour,
To be our sweet Saviour.

The Holly bears a berry,
As red as any blood;
And Mary bore sweet Jesus Christ,
To do poor sinners good.
The Holly bears a prickle,
As sharp as any thorn;
And Mary bore sweet Jesus Christ,
On Christmas day in the morn,
On Christmas day in the morn.

The Holly bears a bark,
As bitter as any gall;
And Mary bore sweet Jesus Christ,
For to redeem us all.
The Holly and the Ivy,
Now both are full well grown;
Of all the trees that spring in wood,
The Holly bears the crown,
The Holly bears the crown.

Another of the ancient songs is Martin Luther's "New Year's Carol":

Ah! dearest Jesus, Holy Child,
Make Thee a bed, soft, undefil'd,
Within my heart, that it may be
A quiet chamber kept for Thee.
My heart for very joy doth leap,
My lips no more can silence keep,
I too must sing, with joyful tongue,
That sweetest ancient cradle song,
"Glory to God in highest heaven,
Who unto man His Son hath given."
While angels sing, with pious mirth,
A glad New Year to all the earth.

Here is a poem of modern times, written by Rosalie M. Jonas:

Nobody ain't Christmas shoppin'
Fur his stockin',
Nobody ain't cotch no turkey,
Nobody ain't bake no pie.
Nobody 's laid nuthin' by;
Santa Claus don't cut no figger
Fur his mammy's little nigger.

Seems lak everybody 's rushin'
An' er crushin';
Crowdin' shops an' jammin' trolleys,
Buyin' shoes an' shirts an' toys
Fur de white folks' girls an' boys;
But no hobby-horse ain't rockin'
Fur his little wore-out stockin'.

He ain't quar'lin, recollec',
He don't 'spec'
Nuthin'—it 's his not expectin'
Makes his mammy wish—O Laws!—
Fur er nigger Santy Claus,
Totin' jus' er toy balloon
Fur his mammy's little coon.

This one, by Richard Watson Gilder, shows another entirely different style, in its own way very charming:

Tell me what is this innumerable throng
Singing in the heavens a loud angelic song?
These are they who come with swift and shining feet
From round about the throne of God the Lord of Light to greet.

O, who are these that hasten beneath the starry sky,
As if with joyful tidings that through the world shall fly?
The faithful shepherds these, who greatly were afeared
When, as they watched their flocks by night, the heavenly host appeared.

Who are these that follow across the hills of night
A star that westward hurries along the fields of light?
Three wise men from the East, who myrrh and treasure bring
To lay them at the feet of him, their Lord and Christ and King.

What babe new-born is this that in a manger cries?
Near on her bed of pain his happy mother lies.
O, see! the air is shaken with white and heavenly wings—
This is the Lord of all the earth, this is the King of Kings.

Tell me, how may I join in this holy feast
With all the kneeling world, and I of all the least?
Fear not, O faithful heart, but bring what most is meet;
Bring love alone, true love alone, and lay it at his feet.

These selections, taken from among the many gems contained in this book, will give a better idea of it than any extended review. Cloth, decorated covers; gilt top. Pp. 369. Price $1.25. Macmillan Company, New York, publishers.

Studies in the Resurrection of Christ: An Argument. By Charles H. Robinson, M.A., Canon of Ripon and Editorial Secretary of the S. P. O. Longmans, Green & Co., New York. Canon Robinson has here given us an elaborate, fully indexed, and, it may well be claimed, an exhaustive treatise upon Christ's resurrection; the testimony upon which it is based; the way in which great thinkers have regarded it, and its vital importance to the system of Christian theology.

Ecclesia Discens. The Church's Lesson from the Age. By the Rev. James H. F. Peile, M.A., Vicar of All Saints, Knightsbridge, and Canon of St. Michael's, Coventry. Longmans, Green & Co., London and New York. A collection of sermons and essays dealing with the problems of our time, and especially considering them in the light of historical parallels and of distant influences. Mr. Peile's attitude toward the present-day agnostic is far too apologetic. The burden of proof lies on him, not on us.

When Skies Are Gray, With a Rift or Two. Verses. By Clarence Watt Heazlitt. The Neale Publishing Company, New York. A collection of unpretentious and serious rhymes, with here and there a touch of humor. This is a fair sample of them:

"COMPANIONS

"Two figures on a silent road went slowly on together;
'Twas near the utmost bound of life, and bleak and cold the weather;
The face of one was stern and hard; sad-faced and bowed his brother;
One figure gray was Selfishness, and Loneliness the other."

Would not "Wretchedness" have been ethically the more fitting companion of "Selfishness"?

Heart Songs. Contributed by 25,000 people, and edited by Joe Mitchell Chapple. Containing seventy of the most popular sacred songs and hymns, it may well be used at morning or evening family worship; containing a dozen or so lullabies and child songs, it may be used in the nursery or mother's room at bedtime for the little ones; containing school and college songs, it will make our boys happy to gather about the piano for an evening of song; containing a choice collection of sentimental songs and ballads, it will help our daughters to entertain the family circle, and the old folks will sing or listen by the hour to the negro plantation melodies, while patriotic and war songs will bring back to them memories of the days of their youth. Decorated cloth covers; gilt top. Pp. 512. Price $2.50. Chapple Publishing Company, Boston.

Tales of the Red Children. By Abbie Farwell Brown and James Mackintosh Bell. The ten tales contained in this book are those which the Canadian Indians tell, sitting about their camp-fires in the winter evenings. Cloth binding. Illustrations. Pp. 126. $1. The Red Caps of Lyons. By Herbert Hayens. This is a story of the French Revolution, thrillingly told. Cloth binding. Six illustrations by Lionel Edwards. Pp. 302. $1.50. The Adventures of Little Knight Brave. By Frances Byrne Rees. This fairy story is captivatingly written. Cloth covers. Illustrated by Alice R. Leu. Pp. 325. $1.50. Florence Nightingale. By Laura E. Richards. Young people will find the story of "The Angel of the Crimea" instructive, interesting and entertaining. Cloth binding. Illustrated. Pp. 167. $1.25. The above four books are published by D. Appleton & Co., New York.

"I Wish It Didn't Be Night"

THE cares of the day are ended, the shadows are gathering fast,
The last glow of sunlight has faded, the sky
with clouds is o'ercast;
I silently sit by the window to reflect in the fading light,
When a baby voice whispers beside me: "I wish it didn't be night."
Then adding, "Oh, Mamma! I 'faid of the dark, why don't it be always light?
Oh, Mamma, p'ease 'et me get close, close to you! I wish it didn't be night."

And there in the deepening twilight, the baby hands holding me tight, Comes the thought, "Ah! children of larger growth oft wish it were never night.
The shadows of life terrify them, grim spectres to poor human eyes:
Long, long are the nights of sorrow! When,
oh, when will the morning arise?
Yet the darkness we dread and the shadow but betoken for us the new light
Of a glorious coming to-morrow, which scatters
the terrors of night.

So I press my baby boy closer to my mother-heart of love
And think of the heavenly Father who watches o'er me from above,
And altho' the dark night of earth's trials may cause me to tremble and shrink,
I nestle close, close to His heart of love, and into His will sweetly sink.
And gently He hushes His child to rest, the shadows now cease to affright,
As I wateh and wait for the summons: "Come hither, where never 'tis night."

"Stoled" Her Christmas

A WEEPING child stood before the desk of the police station. She could scarcely speak for her sobs, while hot tears fell on her red coat and trickled down to the floor.

"Have you lost your mother, baby?" asked kind-hearted Lieutenant McLaughlin, whirling around in his revolving chair to face the tiny intruder.

No answer except sobs, which now came harder than ever.

"Did somebody hurt you? What's the matter? Brace up, baby—we'll fix you, no matter what it is."

The kind words and gentle tone of the big, brightly uniformed man seemed to give the little five-year-old courage, and she managed to stammer out between deep anguished sighs, "I's los' my Christmas. Somebody stoled my Christmas."

"Stole your Christmas? What under the canopy! Who stole your Christmas? Why—it won't be Christmas for a fortnight yet, baby. What do you mean?"

"My pennies!" sobbed the child, quite out of patience at the lieutenant's density. "My pennies in my bank. The bad burglar! He breaked it all up—an' he stoled my Christmas!"

And again she dissolved in heart-broken tears:

"He did, did he? Stole the pennies you had been saving up for Christmas? Well—that is about the meanest burglar yet! I don't wonder you cry, poor little thing!"

"Will you get him, p'ease—an' put him in jail?" wailed the small complainant.

"Get him? Well, I guess so, or we'll know the reason why," and the lieutenant pushed his call-bell furiously.

Inside of ten minutes every policeman in the precinct knew about the bold, bad burglar, who "stoled" the carefully hoarded Christmas pennies of little Mamie Grass. If a bank had been robbed of millions, the lieutenant could not have done more. A whole squad of policemen have vowed to find Mamie's burglar, or, in the language of their chief, "know the reason why."

Thus the Christmas spirit touches the hearts of all.

Astronomical Queries

By PROF. S. P. LELAND, Seabreeze, Fla.

N. W. M., Springfield, Mass. Why is it that the planet Mars does not shine as brightly now as it has done at other times upon its near visits to our earth? I have seen it before shine bright enough so that, by looking on the ground before me intently, I could see my shadow, but I cannot do it this time.

The orbit of Mars is not a circle; it is elliptical. The same is true of our earth. The earth and Mars revolve around the sun in the same direction. Our orbit being shorter, we go around in less time than Mars. We do not come together on the same side of the sun at every revolution, but only once in about twenty-six months. After seven of these meetings, the two planets come into greatest proximity. This occurs about every fifteen years. They thus came together in 1862, 1877, 1892, 1907, and will do so again in 1923. When they are thus together the brightness of Mars is greatly increased. It was probably at one of these dates that your shadow was cast by the light of the little planet. When this proximity occurs, Mars is resplendent in its brightness and beauty.

A Highway of Communication

It goes by your door. Every home, every office, every factory, and every farm in the land is on that great highway or within reach of it. It is a highway of communication and every Bell Telephone is a gateway by which it can be reached.

Millions of messages travel over this highway every day. In the great cities they follow one another like the bullets from a machine gun, and over the wide reaches of the country they fly with the speed of shooting stars.

The Bell service carries the thoughts and wishes of the people from room to room, from house to house, from community to community, and from state to state.

This service adds to the efficiency of each citizen, and multiplies the power of the whole nation.

The Bell system brings eighty million men, women and children into one telephone commonwealth, so that they may know one another and live together in harmonious understanding.

A hundred thousand Bell employees are working all the time on this highway of communication. Every year it is made longer and broader, and its numerous branches are more widely extended. Every year it is furnished with a larger number of telephone gateways and becomes the means of greater usefulness.

The Bell Long Distance Telephone will meet your new needs and serve your new purposes. It means — one policy, one system, universal service. Every Bell Telephone is the center of the System.

"California Now or Never!"

"The Kuhn California Project" will irrigate 250,000 acres in the famous Sacramento Valley. The land is ready! The water is ready! Are you ready? The sale of these rich valley lands has just begun in tracts of 10 to 80 acres. Small payment down; then ten annual payments.

The valley is garden soil, 50 feet deep, yielding immense crops of fruit, alfalfa, sugar beets and all the famous products of California. Mature orange groves on these lands have yielded as high as $1,000 per acre. If you are going to have a farm, why not have the best? The Kuhns are always looking for the best, and their experts tell them in this enterprise they have found it. They are putting millions of dollars into improvements to make it still better. The land is close to big markets and will pay for itself.

You take no chance in bnying land nnder the Knhn projects. The Kuhn interests are irrigating 400,000 acres in the Twin Falls Country, Idaho. Their great Sacramento Valley project offers a frostless winter and a still wider range of crops. Organize a California Colony in your own eity or town. Take your neighbors with you.

There is in press a very choice book of 48 pages, "California—Now or Never." It is by far the handsomest California book ever issued, and will show you at a glance whether you want a home ranch in California. To insure a select distribntion, it is priced at ten cents. All other publications which are fully descriptive are free. Fill out the coupon below and mail. If you want the new book, enclose ten cents for each copy.

Young Mr. Cannon, Killed in Nicaragua

OUR CENTRAL AMERICAN WAR-CLOUD

THOSE European Powers which have now and then congratulated themselves that the Monroe Doctrine was dead, and had been figuratively laid away in camphor as a curiosity upon the diplomatic shelf with outworn treaties and by-gone declarations of war, received a severe shock the first week of December. The shock was caused by the firm grip our government took of the trouble in Nicaragua, whose president, Zelaya, has become the international firebrand in the Southern republics since Castro set sail for France and was never able to get back again. President Taft and Secretary Knox have no intention of allowing one Central American State to upset the general peace of a large part of a continent or get embroiled with foreign nations, which might result in a war involving several Powers. Backing their demands with a section of the United States Navy, they are determined to make the rulers of Nicaragua, whether they belong to the old régime or to the revolutionary party, observe the obligations the Central American States entered into in 1907, and also make reparation for the murder of Americans in that country.

President Zelaya has added to the crime of killing citizens of the United States insult to our government. He opened letters sent from the State Department at Washington to our consuls, and threatened violence to those charged with the care of American interests. The murder of the two Americans was merely the culmination of a long series of events which have taxed the patience of our national government beyond endurance for two years.

Secretary Knox waited for certain despatches confirmatory of the recent outrages. When they came, two startling things happened. Secretary Knox sent the Nicaraguan chargé d'affaires at Washington his passports and permission to leave the country, and with this went one of the most epoch-making documents of recent years. It was a letter in which Secretary Knox gave an outline of the turbulent situation in Central America caused by the machinations of President Zelaya; the way in which he had incited wars among neighboring States, who otherwise would live at peace; the way in which the President of Nicaragua had misused his authority at home, taking almost supreme power, until the country remained a republic in name only; the imprisonment of his opponents, who represented the better aspirations of Nicaragua; the killing of Americans, who were at least entitled to the rights of belligerents, and his general disregard of treaty obligations. Hardly in history has there been such a scathing description of the acts of the ruler of a foreign State embodied in a diplomatic document, but all Washington thinks that it is amply justified, and has cleared the international air.

The second decisive move was brought about by brief orders, telegraphed to various fleet commanders and to our Navy yards. The order to prepare for a campaign was received at 11 A.M. on December 2 at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. In a few minutes companies of marines—ever ready and ever foremost when duty on foreign shores is called for—were swinging in line up to the front of the government storehouses, where ball cartridges were served out to each man. They were also supplied with light-weight clothing, suitable for a campaign in the tropics. At noon, one hour after the order had been issued, the whole battalion was on its way to Jersey City to take the train for Philadelphia, where other detachments from other navy yards were gathering to embark on the transport Prairie. The force included several machine-gun detachments, and Admiral Kimball came on board at the last moment to take command.

Marines on Transport "Prairie," Starting for Nicaragua

Meanwhile, several cruisers and gunboats closed in on both coasts of Nicaragua, from near-by Pacific and Atlantic stations, ready to act at once on orders from Washington. The Buffalo steamed over from Panama and landed four hundred marines at El Castrillo, the town where Cannon and Groce met their untimely end. With the Buffalo were the Marietta and the Des Moines, each bearing large detachments of marines.

The cruiser Albany, which the United States bought from Great Britain during the war with Spain, was soon lying off Corinto, with the cruiser Yorktown. Six thousand marines and bluejackets were ready to land on both coasts—a force of determined men—which must have given the erratic President of Nicaragua some anxious hours when he found them only waiting the order for invasion to man their boats and force a landing in the face of any force which he might bring against them.

It was the avowed intention of our government to establish peace in the country, police it, and see that Zelaya did not make good his escape. To say that Zelaya was astonished is putting it mildly. He said he thought he had a right to put the Americans to death, and expressed indignation at the fact that his representative in Washington was ordered home. Hardly had he heard this when more disturbing news reached his ears.

The Vicksburg cleared for action in the harbor of Corinto, and her long, black guns, shotted and ready for action, were pointed at the town. Marines from the Marietta marched into Greytown, and camped in the plaza, the great public square of the city, posted their sentries and sent out their patrols. The United States had taken possession of a part at least of Nicaraguan soil. Thus, at more than one point, the American reinforcement will be able to make a landing without encountering opposition. The insurgents, who represent the better sober thought of the country, which is heartsick at the tyranny of Zelaya, who has been a dictator instead of a President, are now well equipped. While it is not probable that the insurgents and the

THE YOUNGER SON

TEXT—Luke 15 : 11

"A certain man had two sons."

THERE is no such person as the prodigal son in the Word of God. He is found only in the word of man. There is a younger son in the Bible, whose character has been overshadowed by his reputation as the prodigal. His nickname has, to a large extent, defeated God's purpose in the parable. His father calls him "my son," and in speaking of him to the elder son says "thy brother." The familiar name "prodigal" is neither Scriptural, logical, nor evangelical. The Eastern Church has always known him as the "wise son." Not until three centuries after the story of the younger son was written did the Western Church begin to call him the Prodigal. When one sheep jumps over a hedge, the other sheep in the flock have a tendency to follow. Seventeen centuries ago some person or parson called this boy a prodigal, and, like sheep, the tendency of persons and parsons has been to follow. The younger son came home, but his reputation, like the "Wandering Jew," goes marching on.

There are seven known facts concerning this younger son. Let us study his history and carefully examine the facts. We will divide his history into sevenths, and study him arithmetically. Fractions were never attractive in school, and are seldom used in church except on the contribution plate. While putting the fraction into our sermon we will make the problem so simple that even a child can solve it.

Leaving Home

The first fact recorded concerning this young man is: "FATHER, GIVE ME THE PORTION OF GOODS THAT FALLETH TO ME." Was there anything wrong in this request? He had probably "come of age," when, according to the custom of the times, his portion was due. We note that the father divided unto THEM his living. The older son, as well as the younger, received his portion. If it were not the young man's right, the father made it his privilege. The time had come for the boy to be thrown on his own responsibility. The first seventh we will put down in the younger son's favor.

The second seventh is: "AND NOT MANY DAYS AFTER THE YOUNGER SON GATHERED ALL TOGETHER AND TOOK HIS JOURNEY." No haste, as of one who had quarreled with father or brother. He went out from the old home. This was the natural and logical thing for him to do. When birds are hatched they grow together in the nest until conditions become somewhat crowded, then they gather all the feathers they can together and fly out from the old home. God never intended that two boys should grow into manhood, marry, rear families, and remain in the same house. By the feudal and unnatural law of primogeniture it is the younger boy, with the smaller portion, who must leave the ancestral home. Contrary to the prejudice existing against this younger son we must put another seventh to his credit. He went out because it was not the custom to stay in.

The third seventh is that he "TOOK HIS JOURNEY INTO A FAR COUNTRY." Horace Greeley called from the East, "Young man, go West." It was really the call of the great West for the younger son in the East. This younger son, from time immemorial, has gone into a FAR country. Abram heard the call, and into a far country he went, to found a nation and to bless a world. England's younger sons have established her colonies. The older son has received the ancestral estate and remained at home. The younger son has gone into a far country, and the result is America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand. Here, then, is another seventh that we must put down to the credit of the younger son. Three sevenths, more credit than has been given to him in three centuries.

Riotous Living Leads to Want

The fourth seventh is that, having taken his journey into a far country, he there "WASTED HIS SUBSTANCE WITH RIOTOUS LIVING." Such waste is a crime. Here we do not one bit excuse him. He went wrong, and admits it. The by-product of waste is want. No man has a right to waste anything that has been entrusted to him. Physical, mental, spiritual waste results in great calamity. With more money than experience, freed from the restraints of home environment, the younger son is carried by his weaker self into "riotous living." But even here it is possible that we have overestimated the extent of his crime. That he sinned we know from his own confession, but the nature of his sin we know only from the elder son's testimony. How the elder son knew the MANNER of the younger son's "rioting" we cannot answer. We know, however, that his testimony, to some extent at least, must be discredited as being prejudiced. However, the younger son did wrong, transgressed the laws of God and man, and suffered beyond the power of human estimate. Like the "Reckless Engineer," he could say:

I have thrown the throttle open and am tearing down the track:
I have thrown it out to full speed and no hand can hold me back!
'Tis my hand controls the engine, though another owns the rail,
But for once I'm in the open and the yard lights pass and pale!

Green lights! Red lights! They have hung the signals out!
Caution here! Danger, ho! And what's the man about?
'Tis true he owns the engine, to do as he has done,
But how about the final word—when he ends the run?

Light lost! Life lost! Flag, O flag the others back!
Switch the wreck! Ditch the wreck! Dare any block the track?
There creeps into the Terminal the man who had his day,
But I wonder, O my soul, just what his God will say!

This fourth seventh must be counted against the younger son. Nor does he attempt to excuse himself for it, but with a naked, lacerated and bruised soul he stands before the world.

The fifth seventh. "BEGINNING TO BE IN WANT, HE WENT AND JOINED HIMSELF TO A CITIZEN OF THAT COUNTRY, AND HE SENT HIM INTO HIS FIELDS TO FEED SWINE." This means that the young man found a job and went to work. It was not a position suited to him, but it was, doubtless, the only one he could find. It was better than begging, infinitely better than stealing, and saved him from becoming a tramp. If the hundreds of young men who are tramping the streets of New York, standing on the Bread Line, and sleeping in places unworthy of their early associations, would go to work their problem would be half solved. The "down-and-out" would be on their way "up-and-in." The great need of today is to persuade the unemployed to engage in some honest toil. The younger son was too proud to beg, too honest to steal, but to work he was not ashamed. Not the job he chose, but the one that chose him. He went to work. You will all agree with me that this seventh also must be put down to the younger son's credit. He had gone out of his early home Paradise to earn his bread by the sweat of his face. He found thorns, thistles and swine. He ate the herb of the field, but was not satisfied. We must give him real credit for meeting the conditions and for doing his best. I do believe he gave satisfaction to the swine and to their owner.

"He Came to Himself"

Now, how does the sum in fractions stand? Out of five sevenths we have four to the young man's credit. It does seem that the Eastern Church had a reason for calling him the wise son.

We approach the sixth seventh with interest. "WHEN HE CAME TO HIMSELF HE SAID: HOW MANY HIRED SERVANTS OF MY FATHER HAVE BREAD ENOUGH AND TO SPARE AND I PERISH WITH HUNGER!" When he came to himself! Some one has asked, Where had he been? He had been away from his better self. Loose thinking, high living and liberty translated into license loosed him from his better self. Then when he found himself in want, forsaken by his former friends, hungry and ragged, he was beside himself. That is, his better self stood alongside of his other self and compared notes. Next, he was BELOW himself. His position, while honest, was below that which belonged to him by birth, culture and true manhood. Then we read that he came to himself. I have somewhere read that a professor once asked a young nurse what she would do to revive a man who had been almost drowned. Her answer was, "I would first lay him on his back, with his face to the ground." Rather a difficult position for a man to find himself in when he wakes up. The younger son found himself in a very awkward moral position when he came to himself. President McKinley once said, "It is not so much the length of the step, but the direction that counts." When the younger son came to himself he took a step in the right direction. It was a step away from the poorer self. This seventh is surely also to be placed to his credit. We now have five sevenths in favor of the young man, and but one seventh against him. Both the Eastern and Western Church should regard the last seventh with interest. Is it not in favor of calling him the wise son rather than the prodigal?

A Wise Resolution

Let us read carefully this last seventh, uniting it on with the previous one. "And when he came to himself he said, How many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!" Now the last seventh. "I WILL ARISE AND GO TO MY FATHER, AND WILL SAY UNTO HIM, FATHER, I HAVE SINNED AGAINST HEAVEN, AND BEFORE THEE, AND AM NO MORE WORTHY TO BE CALLED THY SON; MAKE ME AS ONE OF THY HIRED SERVANTS." To the teacher's question, "What is repentance?" the boy's apt answer came, "It is being sorry enough to quit." Sorry enough to quit his rioting, this younger son now takes a series of steps in the right direction. He started home. That meant that he mastered pride, faced the responsibility for his sin, and performed one of the bravest acts possible in a young man's life. Young men have performed deeds of valor and received a hero's medal who would have been cowards if placed in this young man's position. One of the most difficult things in life is to go back to the old home and squarely meet the issues of a misspent life. There are scores of young men in our city to-night who long to be at home. They have a good home waiting for them and loving hearts ready to receive them, but they do not return. Why? Because they do not have the physical, mental and moral courage to face the issue.

A Critical Moment

Let me recall an actual incident. A young man determined to go home and begin life anew. He started back on a train that would bring him to the old home at night. When the train pulled in at the station he got off on the opposite side, plunged into the shadows, along an unfrequented street and on to the old road leading to the farm. The gate was open, and seemed to welcome him. He hurried along the familiar path, and, standing by the door, looked in through the window. He saw his father reading the paper, his mother busy with her knitting, a younger sister at her books and the older brother in another room talking with wife and child. He did not have the courage to face all this, and he went out, closed the gate, walked to another station and took the next train back to New York. He was a coward in the strife of conflicting emotions.

This younger son in the parable was brave enough to go home, honest enough to confess his sin, and manly enough not to quarrel with his elder brother. We must also place to his credit the fact that he abandoned his own and accepted his father's plan of surrender. You all say, Put this one seventh down strong, without shading either figure, and put it down in favor of the younger son. Adding the fractions, the result is six sevenths in the young man's favor and but one seventh against him. And now listen. The father wasted no time on the six sevenths that were right, but centralized his forgiving love on the one seventh that was wrong.

The Lesson of the Parable

It is no doubt true that our Lord told this parable especially to illustrate the truth of the Gospel just at this point, but the reason why the parental forgiveness and salvation could become effective at this one vital point is that through all his wandering the younger son was still HIS FATHER'S CHILD, possessing also many of the traits, as we have seen, which were in themselves not unworthy of that Father's home. He converted the son's sorrow for the wasted seventh into a willingness to again become a son in the old home. Clothed in the best robe, with a ring on his hand and shoes on his feet, he sat down at the feast. Riotous living forgiven and forgotten, he was seven sevenths right and righteous in the sight of his father and the servants. Henry Drummond said: "There are two types of sin—sins of the body and sins of the disposition. The younger son is an example of the former, the elder brother of the latter." We hope the harsh and selfish disposition of the elder brother was checked and that he became reconciled with his brother in time for the feast.

The younger or wise son returned, became a son again in his father's house. He thus escaped the terminal crash of the "Reckless Engineer."

"LADY BOUNTIFUL" TO THE SQUIRRELS

Mrs. Russell Sage's Work of Kindness Among the Furred and Feathered Pets in Central Park

A Christmas House for Little "Furry"

Ready to Munch Your Peanuts

PEOPLE the world over know of the benefactions of Mrs. Russell Sage, who is so wisely spending the millions entrusted to her keeping, but comparatively few know the humane side of her character and that with all her philanthropic interests she still finds time to play Lady Bountiful to the birds and squirrels of Central Park. It is largely due to her efforts that these little creatures enjoy the finest playground in the world and that youthful bands no longer roam the park with airguns and other weapons, bent upon maiming and destroying animal life.

At first, when Mrs. Sage began to take an interest in the little furred and feathered pets, she was criticised by scoffers; but she only smiled still more serenely, and went steadfastly on her way. She knew that her purpose was right; that back even of her love for God's small creatures her supreme desire, primarily, was to teach a humane lesson to the children of New York, and thus banish forever the reign of terror in bird and squirrel-land.

It was during the months of convalescence, after a painful and rather serious accident, when Mrs. Sage was peremptorily ordered to give up all work and seek complete rest and diversion in the open air, that she first became interested in the birds and squirrels. She had been a keen observer all her life, but as she herself says, she had always been too busy to appreciate the beauties of Central Park until this time. As soon as she was able to leave her carriage, it afforded her great delight to sit on one of the benches in the sunshine and make friends of the birds and squirrels. From the very beginning the little creatures divined her kindly heart and came to her, as if they had known her always. They seemed to know the exact hour her carriage would arrive, for at noon each day they would congregate along the driveway and sit expectantly on their haunches, nodding heads and tails and otherwise expressing furry delight over the anticipated arrival of their Lady Bountiful. No sooner was she seated on one of the rustic benches than her reception would begin. "Sir Fatness," "Mrs. Henrietta," "Jim Corbett," "Blind Mike," "Little Mother," "Teddy," "Mollie Whitefoot," and a score of other furry, bushy-tailed creatures, all named by Mrs. Sage herself, would scramble over one another to reach the best point of vantage for the feast that was sure to follow.

She knew each squirrel by name, and her acquaintance extended to their numerous homes and their progeny. "Blind Mike," a handsome fellow who had lost an eye during the reign of terror, and "Little Mother," a gentle, matronly squirrel, came all the way from 110th Street two or three times a week to call on Mrs. Sage. When the hour of parting came, they would carry nuts to their homes, and remain there until the supply was exhausted. "Teddy" often accompanied Mrs. Sage to his home, in a hollow tree at the foot of a certain hill, and initiated her into the mysteries of his "campaign ground."

"He was master without being mean," says Mrs. Sage, "and a model citizen in every way. I could not help but observe that 'Jim Corbett' never presumed to pick a quarrel with him, as he did with some of the other squirrels.

Mrs. Sage's real pleasure began when the feeding grounds were established, and needless to say these "grounds"—a place set apart on a hill in Central Park—were always kept supplied with nuts and seeds. Just as soon as the magic words "Come along, come along, come along" sounded over the hilltop a stampede in squirrel-land would take place. Down tree trunks, over huge rocks, through glades, from every direction they would scamper, a happy band, no longer in the dominion of prey. In due time the sympathies of the Park Commissioner were enlisted.

Now the visitor to Central Park is greeted by feathered songsters of innumerable varieties, the presence of which makes the park a delight, not only to the wayfarer but to the nature student as well. In fact, since nature study has been introduced into the public schools many nature students from far and near have visited Central Park to study the habits of the birds and squirrels.

"Instil into the boy's mind the great truth that it is kingly to be kind to the innocent and helpless and you have him on the road to upright manhood," said Mrs. Sage one day, as she sat on a rustic bench at the squirrels' and birds' tribunal—the feeding grounds.

That statement was destined to become a precept, for the humane work in the public schools has really been an outgrowth of the efforts to preserve the bird and animal life in Central Park. Then, too, there has come a general recognition of the grand truth that God gave every creature its life to enjoy. Children as well as grown folk have come to know the joy of a confidential relation with the birds and squirrels, and have assumed the role of friendly protectors, instead of persecutors.

Mrs. Russell Sage Visiting Her Animal Pets in the Park

It was the condition of the birds and squirrels in winter time that appealed to Mrs. Sage most of all. Not even on the coldest or stormiest days did she miss her visits, for those, she thought, were the days she knew she was most needed.

"The condition of the birds was truly pathetic," she said. "They would sit on the little clearing from which the snow had been scooped, trying hard to protect themselves from the cold. Had it not been for the commissioner's kindness in keeping the feeding-grounds well supplied with seeds and nuts, and otherwise looking after the comforts of the birds and squirrels, many would have perished."

The commissioner smiles knowingly at this tribute, and says he and the squirrels know a great deal they might tell if Mrs. Sage were not so modest. More than one gold coin has been slipped into the hands of park officials to provide food and shelter for the little friends of Lady Bountiful.

So when Christmas time comes round, with peace and good will toward mankind, there is a real holiday spirit up Central Park way—a season of peace and good will in squirreldom. The giant trees shake off their dead leaves, and in the high boughs little rustic cottages take on a gala appearance. "Teddy" the Strenuous is still there, and so is "Jim Corbett." Nor does Mrs. Sage forget her little friends. Through her efforts many other creature lovers have become interested, and the Christmas season is always an interesting one in the park. Holly-hung squirrel houses, decorated with "Merry Christmas" greetings, sweetmeats, rich pecans, walnuts, peanuts—long strings of them—and even tiny stockings filled with goodies are contributed by youngsters who would not enjoy their Christmas without sharing it with the birds and squirrels. And even Lady Bountiful herself would not think her Christmas complete did she not visit her pets with generous gifts calculated to please the birds and squirrels, to which she has given so much of her thoughtfulness and womanly pity.

MRS. BIRD'S CHRISTMAS APPEAL

THE GOSPEL SETTLEMENT, 211 CLINTON STREET,
NEW YORK, December 12, 1909.

MY DEAR FRIENDS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: I want to tell you something about the little neglected children of the East Side. For twelve years they have been crowding into our Settlement, and our number has increased so much that we must have some financial help.

These little folks crowd our steps long before the hour of classes, and as soon as the door opens they rush in as though they were afraid of losing their chance. As I write, the class-rooms are full, and they are making our Settlement ring with the strains of their Christmas hymns, "It Came Upon a Midnight Clear" and "We Three Kings of Orient Are." We find ourselves straitened financially, and I have thought if each child of yours would send us a small gift how much we could do for our little children, and I am sure it is as much needed as in a foreign field. We want these girls and boys to hear of our Saviour, and to grow up not only happy but to be a blessing to the world in which they live.

The teachers are enthusiastic in their plans for the benefit of the classes; but just now we are making the preparations for our great Christmas tree. There are over nine hundred little ones in our family, and if you could see the eager faces assembled daily and nightly in our class-rooms I think you would feel like sending a mite to this work, which is so much needed, that it may go forward with greater strength and joy. Very affectionately,

Sarah J. Bird

PUTTING THE CAPITOL IN ORDER

By ABBY GUNN BAKER

WITH the reassembling of Congress the great building on the Capitolian hill is again in spick-span order for the national legislators. For the past four months, however—indeed, ever since Congress adjourned last August—it has been given over to the hands of cleaners, plumbers, and workmen of all descriptions.

Every year, as soon as the legislative session closes, usually in the spring or early summer, the annual house-cleaning of the Capitol begins. The house-cleaning of a building which contains four hundred and thirty rooms is no small undertaking, as Mr. Superintendent Woods and his right-hand man, Mr. David Lynn, can testify. There are literally miles of floor space in the Capitol building, from the sub-basement, fifty feet down in the bowels of the earth, to the spooky attic up under the eaves, where thousands upon thousands of government papers and pamphlets have been stored yearly, ever since the Capitol was built. All this floor space is washed, scoured and polished when the annual house-cleaning takes place. If it chances that any of the flooring is becoming worn beyond safety, up it comes, whether of stone or wood, to be replaced with new and better material, for a neglected floor is not to be tolerated in our carefully kept Capitol. Then all the wall space is cleaned and freshened, and this is another tidy job; for there are more than ninety thousand square yards of wall space in the Capitol, which is not hard to believe when it is remembered that the building itself covers three acres and the stately terraces two and a half acres more.

Window and door cleaning is another item which gives employment to a score of men. If a door is sagging, or a window-frame worn, out it comes and a new mahogany one goes in. Originally, the woodwork of the Capitol was of pine; but all that goes into it now is of the hardest and best mahogany—a wise provision, which in all probability will do away with any necessity of replacing it for the next century. Twice a year the exterior walls of the Capitol are given a thorough washing, and as the building is 751 feet long, 350 feet wide, and measures from the tip of the dome to the base-line 287 feet, this undertaking is one of unusual dimensions. Superintendent Woods engages two of the city fire companies to do the work, and for ten days or two weeks they are busy with hose and reel and engine. The thoroughness of their work is proclaimed in the glistening white marble and granite which delights every tourist's eye. When the exterior of the building is painted—which occurs once every few years—700 gallons of white lead are used upon the dome alone.

Before the general cleaning begins in the interior of the building, all carpets in Senate Chamber, Hall of Representatives and committee rooms come up, and all the furniture is swathed in dust-protecting crash coverings. Hall carpets, rugs, etc., are sent to the steam cleaners; if not to go down again, they are sold at public auction or to second-hand dealers. Every other year, new carpet is laid on floors of the House and Senate. For the House floor 1,400 yards are required, and for the Senate chamber 670 yards. When a new carpet is to be ordered, the manufacturers send a small painted design to Washington for the inspection of the sergeant-at-arms of the Senate or the chief clerk of the House, and the pattern selected is reserved and made up exclusively for the hall in which it is used. This year the Senate carpet is a quiet pattern in deep green, while that which is in the House, the same as used last year, is red. The colors are usually alternated in the carpets of the two chambers.

Another feature of the house-cleaning of the Capitol is the renovation of the many famous pictures and their frames, and the freshening of all the gilding in the building. This work has long been in charge of Captain Duckstein, whose office in the basement is sometimes called facetiously "the picture morgue of the Capitol." For half a century or more, artists who wish to sell their pictures to the government have applied for permission to exhibit them upon the walls of the Capitol, and, failing to gain the necessary permission, they have brought them to Captain Duckstein's office, to wait an opportunity when they may renew the request. It has frequently happened that the pictures left there have remained so long that the artists who brought them have died, and the heirs have failed to call for them. Sometimes pictures that have been purchased have afterward come under the disapproval of the Committee on Rules and have been sent to the captain's office, to remain there indefinitely.

Electric Auto Car Running from the Capitol to the Senate Office Building

In the Capitol building electricity is king. It controls the heating, lighting and ventilating systems, operates the eleven elevators in use in the main building and the more than that number in the two office structures, and transmits the calls of nearly 500 telephones. It has engines and generators of 250 electrical horse-power located in the basement and connected with the power plant erected over in Garfield Park, which supplies all three buildings, and is of sufficient power to supply a good-sized town. As all these electrical appliances are cared for and all the plumbing of the three buildings looked after right in the Capitol, as well as all repairs of every kind which are made, it can be readily imagined that Mr. Woods runs a pretty good-sized factory in the performance of his duty as superintendent. Down in the sub-basement, amid gaunt brick and stone walls and the mammoth foundations of the great building, where the light of day never penetrates, Mr. Woods' factory is located. It contains a well-equipped carpenter shop, a blacksmith shop and a plumbing establishment, which are never idle. There is a cabinet and upholstery room, where all worn furniture is repaired, and a tile and model room, where the stucco work that adorns many of the halls and committee rooms is looked after. The superintendent's store and supply room would suggest a hardware store and the linen division of a big department store, for in it are stored not only all the articles needed to make repairs, but hundreds of towels, used in the bathrooms of the members of the Senate and House, and in their barber shops, beside innumerable rolls of crash for furniture covering and cleaning purposes.

The Senate will have a new proposition laid before it early this session, and one that will create a good deal of interest among the hotelkeepers of the country. It will be in regard to the Senate restaurant. It has always been something of a problem to make that institution a paying venture, from the fact that it virtually supplies but one meal a day—the midday lunch—and practically has no trade except during the session. For a long time, in order to help the men who have run the restaurants in both the House and Senate, Congress has granted the rooms of the restaurants and kitchens rent free and supplied the coal and gas; but even with this help the Senate restaurant has not paid, and last spring the man who had the concession, like several of his predecessors, refused to renew the contract. The matter is to be laid before the Senate by the Committee on Rules, and it is probable that that body will assume control, hire a man on a salary to manage it, and allow the paternal government to bear the financial loss. The restaurant rooms have been extensively improved this fall; the two small rooms reserved for the exclusive use of the Senators have been thrown into one, and new mahogany furniture replaces the old in both this and the public restaurant.

The most effective improvement made in the Capitol during the last recess was in the Military Committee room of the Senate. The new office buildings afforded much more office room in the main building, and Senator Warren, chairman, requested that the apartment next to the Military Committee room be assigned to his use. Mr. Woods partially redecorated it to correspond to the adjoining chamber, and refurnished it. The ceiling of the room was frescoed originally by Brumidi, but the lunettes over the windows, the doorways and fireplace were never decorated. Mr. Woods placed this work in the hands of Mr. Carl Rakeman, a talented artist, whose father was associated with Brumidi for many years in decorating the Capitol. In each lunette he has placed the portrait of a Revolutionary general, framed by an oval laurel wreath, Washington, Joseph Warren, Anthony Wayne and Horatio Gates being selected. Flanking the portraits flags of the Colonial period are draped over the helmets and arms of the time. The decorations are unique in that they are the only design in the Capitol in which the Colonial flag appears.

The new elevators which have been placed in the Senate wing this fall run from the Senate gallery to the sub-basement, where they open into the subway leading to the new office building of the Senate. This subway is very like the stations of the New York City subway. It extends directly under the Capitol plaza, then under the street, and enters the office building at the northeast corner. The entire route is in white tiling, and is lighted all the way with electric bulbs. Small electric auto cars, carrying sixteen passengers, run from one building to the other every three minutes, and make it almost as convenient for a Senator to have his committee room in the office building as in the Capitol. Those office buildings are a marvel of beauty, and flank the Capitol at the north and south. They face the Capitol grounds, three stories high, but were built on sloping ground, and at their rear they reveal their full five-story height. The cost of building and furnishing the two was over $8,000,000, and for perfect equipment and handsome interior and exterior they are not surpassed by any office building in the world. Each of the 92 Senators has a suite of from two to three rooms, splendidly furnished in mahogany, and with every known modern convenience. The most beautiful parts of both buildings are the rotundas, the main stairways and the Conference rooms. The one in the Senate building is 52x74 feet in size, and will seat 300 persons. The walls are of polished and colored marbles, and it contains twelve great Corinthian columns spaced about its walls.

Senator Wetmore of Rhode Island introduced a bill in Congress last winter to purchase the land extending from the Peace monument, at the west of the Capitol, to the new Union Railway Station, six blocks to the north. If this is done, and the space converted into a park connecting with the present grounds of the Capitol, the United States will have by far the most magnificent legislative buildings and grounds of any nation upon the earth.

There is every prospect that this will be a lively winter in Congress. A good many statesmen from the West and South still feel "sore" over the settlement of the tariff last spring, and they are in no mood to acquiesce quietly in any new legislation which may run counter to the interests of the various sections of the country they represent. Senator Aldrich, who led the tariff debate so masterfully, has been making a careful study of our banking and financial system and has been lecturing on these subjects throughout the country this fall. He will be the leader of his party again in the Senate chamber, for it is pretty generally understood that banking and railway legislation will be the predominating subjects this winter. Dolliver of Iowa and Beveridge of Indiana will still lead the "insurgents" in the upper body, ably urged on by Tillman of South Carolina; and even Senator Bacon of Georgia, who has long been recognized as one of the most conservative leaders of his party, will not be apt to put any obstruction in the way if a war comes on. In the House, Speaker Cannon and the Republican House leader, Payne of New York, with his able second, Dalzell of Pennsylvania, will have their hands full against a strong party opposition, led by the brilliant Clark of Missouri. Brooklyn's doughty member, John Joseph Fitzgerald, will be heard from among the "insurgents," while the former chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, Fowler of New Jersey, is not apt to pour oil on the troubled waters of currency reform legislation.

All the circumstances considered, it does not take a prophet to forecast a lively session of Congress.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—At the union meetings held recently under the leadership of H. W. Bromley at Hawarden, Ia., about 150 were added to the churches.

—The secretary of the Seamen's Christian Association of New York, Miss E. M. Bangs, writes: "Our work among seamen continues with remarkably good results. We are hoping to increase our usefulness. We are unpretentious in our building, but the interior is a busy scene from morning until night. We were the pioneers of aggressive work among seamen along the North River front."

—Superintendent Wyburn and the staff of workers in the old Jerry McAuley Water Street Mission, New York, have been gladdened by the gift of $10,000 toward the erection af a new building for the Mission. The friends of the work now consider that the prospect for a suitable building in the near future is bright. Sixty-five thousand dollars more will be needed to assure the success of the project. Never has the Mission done better service among the "down-and-outs" than now, and the steady expansion of its activities make increased facilities an absolute necessity. Thousands of men have been won from lives of sin to righteousness by this wonderful Mission.

—Mrs. Elizabeth Brewster, American missionary at Hinghua, China, sends this touching incident: "A young girl, Dan Udi, was stirred in the meetings by the Holy Spirit. She repented, confessed and was saved. Seven days later she was stricken by the bubonic plague. Before she died, she called her non-Christian relatives and preached the "Jesus doctrine" to them. Twelve of these were convinced of the truth, repented and accepted the Gospel. They turned from their idols to believe in and serve the living God. She also exhorted her Christian relatives. Eight of those who heard her on the sin of Sabbath breaking decided to turn from this sin, and keep wholly sacred to God's service his holy day. These had repented of other sins before. The next day Dan Udi passed away."

—The Christian band of commercial travelers known as the "Gideons" have lately chosen as their secretary W. E. Henderson, who takes the place made vacant by the resignation of F. A. Garlick. Mr. Henderson is an ardent Christian worker. The little white pitcher, worn on the lapel button of the Gideons, has come to stand for a very high type of consecrated men. The Gideons are now 7,000 in number. They have begun a campaign to secure 50,000 commercial travelers as members. Already they have placed the Bible in thousands of hotels in all parts of the world.

—A union evangelistic campaign was carried on November 14 to December 5 in Elmira, N. Y., under the direction of Rev. Arthur J. Smith, of New York City. Eight churches of the South Side and the Northern Central R. R. Y. M. C. A. united for the campaign. Mr. Caswallon Davis, formerly leader of the Moody Quartette, was the chorister, with Mr. Fred Butler as soloist. In addition to afternoon and evening services, shop meetings were held every day at noon. Dr. Smith went to Elmira from Kane, Pa., where a similar campaign took place under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., with six churches united in its support.

—J. C. Wallace, San Pedro, Sula, S. A., writes: "In The Christian Herald for October 20 there is an article written by Mr. Nevin O. Winter, 'A Land of Fiestas and Idols.' The writer says that Protestantism has scarcely made an imprint in Central America. I have been a resident of Central and South America for twenty-one years, and have never been in any place where there was not a place of worship more than once a week. Mr. Winter's article says that religion in Puerto Cortez and San Pedro, Sula, Honduras, and Puerto Barrios, Guatemala, has accomplished nothing. That statement is incorrect. In Greytown, Nicaragua, there is a Baptist Church; also in Bluefields and Rama, of the same republic, there are several places of worship of different denominations. In Puerto Limon, Costa Rica, and all along the railroad line until one arrives in San Jose, C. R., there is not one locality to be found which has not a place of worship. In Guatemala the United Fruit Company brought laborers from Jamaica and other places, and they have in their camps ministers to preach the Gospel to these laborers. In Guatemala City there are also churches, and all these places have ministers permanently, and they don't have to go from Belize, British Honduras. In San Salvador, Mr. Bender, an American missionary, is doing good work among the natives. In Puerto Cortez, Honduras, there are two churches, Wesleyan and Episcopal, both with pastors. There is a Wesleyan Church in San Pedro, Sula, and has been for over twenty years. There are at present in San Pedro, Sula, two American missionaries, both working among the natives and foreigners."

Most Exquisite of Its Kind

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The calendar "Dreamland"" is the most exquisite thing of the kind I have ever seen. I am more than delighted to own it, and also glad to have the "Dorcas" picture. I shall have both framed and keep them as Christmas gifts to myself. I thank you cordially and am proud to be a member of The Christian Herald family. I shall show them to all my friends. H. L. The Nicaraguan Trouble

UNDER orders from Washington, forces of United States marines have landed at two or three points in Nicaragua, as the preliminary step to quelling the state of anarchy which has existed there and curbing the lawless rule of President Zelaya, who has not only misgoverned at home, but what is far worse from the international point of view, kept Central America in a state of constant turmoil.

The killing of two Americans without proper trial was the most flagrant of a long series of acts aimed at anything American.

This attitude of Nicaragua is the result of the disappointment felt by that government in not securing the canal. In addition, certain plans of Nicaragua might have forced the United States to place a restraining hand on her activities sooner or later, in any event. The Central American countries would, it seems, live at peace if they were not constantly stirred up by plots of Zelaya, who is anxious to undermine the good work of Mr. Root, when Secretary of State, and to nullify the compact of 1907.

As the United States forbids foreign countries from taking possession of or invading the territories of nations on this side of the Atlantic, it is in honor bound to see that these protected nations do not endanger the peace with impunity.

It is well known that two powers, one across the Atlantic and one across the Pacific, are interested in Nicaragua, and wish to secure naval strongholds there and perhaps a canal route, and it is asserted that some of their representatives may have incited Zelaya in his acts of hostility. The United States has thus a duty to itself to see that the Monroe doctrine is preserved, and that American citizens receive ample protection wherever they may be and a fair trial when charges are made. The double duty—to the world at large and the preservation of our national dignity—will be well performed. We do not covet an inch of Nicaraguan territory, but we do intend to make Nicaragua keep the peace.

If, however, the Nicaraguan canal route possesses strong attraction for some other power, one solution would be for us to buy the available strip of territory, or by diplomatic channels secure its control. If such a canal is constructed, for our own safety it must remain under the authority of our government.

The Lords and the Commons

IN the face of many solemn warnings, some of them from influential Peers, the English House of Lords on the last day of November rejected the budget by a vote of 350 to 75. Some of the Conservatives voted against their own associates, while a number of Liberal-Unionist members either voted for the bill or were absent. It was the first occasion since Cromwell's day when the budget has been killed outright by the Lords, and it has naturally stirred up a tremendous tempest. The radical journals are full of dark prophecies of the abolition of the House of Lords and a new era for Great Britain as the ultimate outcome of the battle between the Lords and Commons; but the probabilities are that the disturbance will be largely confined to political gatherings and the newspapers, and that the situation will gradually reach some sort of satisfactory adjustment at the coming election.

If the country stands strongly by the Liberals, as Chancellor Lloyd-George, Premier Asquith and their associates firmly believe it will, the Liberals will hold to the budget unchanged and the extraordinary privileges assumed by the House of Peers will be subjected to such well-defined limitations as will effectually prevent any repetition of the present crisis. Premier Asquith's resolution, characterizing the action of the Lords as "a breach of the Constitution and a usurpation of the rights of the Commons," passed the Commons by a vote of 349 to 134, and was more than a vote of censure. Taken in conjunction with his remarkable speech arraigning the Peers, it is regarded by the country as a declaration of political war between the two houses. He charged, as a fact known to the whole country, that any Parliament or Cabinet, no matter how able, or how largely it enjoyed the confidence of the country, if it did not meet the approval of the Peers, had to dissolve or resign. Thus the Lords at will could dislocate the entire governmental machinery by blocking the appropriations and refusing all supplies. This the Liberal press has denounced as "a travesty on popular government."

On the other hand, however, a Conservative triumph at the polls, while it might bring some added power and influence to the Peers temporarily, would leave the Liberals powerless to carry through the needed reforms already under way. It would produce a condition so unsatisfactory that reaction would necessarily follow and the whole battle would have to be fought over again at a future election.

Sticking to the Gospel

THAT observant preacher and versatile writer, the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, is having a tilt with that portion of the daily press which is fond of giving to preachers generally, and to certain preachers in particular, the familiar advice to "stick to the Gospel." The good doctor points out that this advice is usually to be interpreted as meaning that Christianity is theoretical and not to be practically applied to the things of everyday life; also that a minister moves outside of his true spiritual zone when he discusses the world and its affairs. This may be very good and convenient newspaper theology, but it has no relevancy to the true functions of the Christian ministry. All things that relate to human life and conduct, from the highest affairs of state down to those that affect the humblest home and individual, are legitimately within the purview of the pulpit. In that ministry which is a model for all preachers, the Master himself dealt with the things of the hour and the moment, as they affected human life and character. His illustrations and parables were drawn from the most familiar incidents of human experience. He did not spare wrongdoers in authority, nor the oppressive rich, nor the unjust judge, nor the defaulting official, nor the violator of public decency. He did not deal in platitudes and abstractions, but he applied the principles of the true religion to the conditions of his time. And so, assuredly, should the Christian minister do to-day, if he means to be faithful. He stands in no dread of session, pew or press; nor does he fear the withdrawal of wealthy support. He feels that he must raise his voice against sin and wrongdoing, in every form and place, social, civil, national, domestic. If he preach not this Gospel, his mission and usefulness are at an end. His is the mighty power to move men, and it is his greatest care not to prostitute that gift to base or sensational ends, but to use it always and only for the glory of God and the advancement of the kingdom of righteousness.

The Health of Missionaries

ONE of the readers of this journal writes a letter of inquiry regarding the health of women missionaries in the foreign field. She asks: "Is it true that some of the Boards send out women to countries in which, owing to climatic conditions, they are unfitted to labor with any reasonable hopes of success? A missionary friend in Africa writes me that that is no fit place for white women. He says that, whether married or single, it is only a question of time when they must go home invalided or die."

It is not to be denied that women missionaries are at a peculiar disadvantage in some places for the reason stated, and this is especially true in Liberia, the Congo and certain other sections of Africa. There are, however, many parts of the Dark Continent comparatively salubrious and in which white men and women may teach the Gospel, and, with reasonable care, enjoy comparative health and vigor. It would be an excellent thing for all missionaries to Liberia, the Congo, Soudan, Angola and Zanzibar to have some medical training, and at each central mission station to have a medical missionary on duty to attend to the health of the general staff of workers. Missionary Boards are giving greater consideration to this important question of the health of the workers than ever before, and care is now being taken to prevent the needless sacrifice of precious lives.

An Inquiry Answered by Dr. Klopsch

QUESTION: Why does the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offer to send free with every renewal and new subscription that exquisite photogravure, "Daughters of Dorcas"? It would seem that the photogravure alone is worth two or three times the subscription price for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Answer: I have set my heart upon making this month—December, 1909—the record month in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I have taken this means for bringing about the desired result.

When our friends see the picture they will show it to their friends, and their friends (as a result) will become our friends, because it will induce them to subscribe.

Then, again, in a large subscription list like that of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD it often happens that people have to make a little sacrifice in order to subscribe at some particular time, and we are offering the picture to make it worth their while to inconvenience themselves a little, if necessary, and send in their subscriptions this month.

Thus, with renewals stimulated, and with new subscriptions induced by our generous offer, we expect that the results for December, 1909, will exceed the results of any other one month in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thus far.

I would consider it a personal favor if our subscribers would help me to accomplish all this, and, by a little work at this propitious season, aid me in my efforts to put the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on a higher plane and thus correspondingly extend the sphere of its beneficent influence.

Here is a little missionary work in which you may engage, and I feel confident that many of our subscribers will be glad to embrace the opportunity.

Only 16 days left. LOUIS KLOPSCH.

GENERAL NOTES

—YOUNG EYES ARE bright and young hands are steady. In our cover illustration the artist shows how grandmother finds it convenient to employ her granddaughter's hands and eyes. A letter must go to the brave daughter who is toiling in some hot kitchen in order that she may earn enough to send comforts to the old folks at home in their infirmity and poverty. Slowly and painfully the young secretary performs her task, for her schooling has been brief; but the letter carries love in its cramped characters, and will cheer the heart of the worker. It is a little bit of human life, all the more true and touching for its very simplicity.

—VERY TOUCHING is this letter, which we have received from a reader in Middleboro, Mass.:

"This five-dollar piece has been in the family since it was paid to my grandfather for service in the War of 1812. I know of no better use for it than in the Bowery Mission Rescue Work. Please do not use my name."

The shining gold piece, minted nearly a hundred years ago, gives evidence of having been carefully preserved as a precious heirloom. We honor the motive which prompts such a sacrifice. It would indeed be difficult to find a nobler use for this gift than it will serve in the war against sin and suffering, which is carried on by the Bowery Mission.

Manuel's Royal Visit

ENGLAND turned aside from the budget to give a royal welcome to Manuel, the young King of Portugal. It is rumored that he is in search of a bride. The King created a very fine impression in the English court, and the report from Windsor was that he was a most charming royal guest. The state banquet given to him was a dazzling function. The young monarch could not have seen a grander display of gold plate at any other court or palace in the world. There were several tons of it, and some pieces were so heavy that four men were required to lift them. It was estimated that there was $5,000,000 worth of gold at that banquet. The young King's speech was in excellent taste, spoken in the purest English. The King of Portugal was made a Knight of the Garter at Windsor, and on the evening of that day attended the state banquet in St. George's Hall, which is the official banqueting place of the Knights of the Garter. After King Edward's remarks welcoming him into the order, Manuel said, among other things: "Your Majesty's words have deeply touched me. They constitute another solemn and eloquent affirmation of the close friendship that has existed between Portugal and Great Britain for nearly six centuries. Only to-day, as Your Majesty has so well said, the treaty of arbitration, which is a new link of peace between our two countries, has been renewed." King Manuel's visit to Paris was almost as enthusiastic as the one in England. He received an ovation at the railway station, where he was officially greeted by Foreign Minister Pichon, and other representatives of the government and the city. He was escorted to the Hotel Bristol. He was the guest of President Fallières for dinner, and enjoyed one of the hunting trips, of which he is so fond, as he did at Windsor. It is generally understood that on this trip he is keeping his eyes wide open for one who will make him a suitable bride. This search for a royal bride reminds us of the patriarch who sent his servant into another country to find a suitable wife for his son, and of the success of the romantic journey. The father of the beautiful girl said, when the proposal was made:

Behold, Rebekah is before thee; take her, and go, and let her be thy master's son's wife, as the Lord hath spoken. And they called Rebekah, and said unto her, Will thou go with this man? And she said, I will go. (Gen. 24: 51, 58.)

Wanted Sinners Only

One of the most singular services ever held in a church took place in the First Methodist Church, South, in Lexington, Ky., recently, when the pastor, Rev. E. G. B. Mann, preached a revival sermon to five hundred persons. The pastor issued notices asking all church members, and people calling themselves Christians, to stay away from his church for a whole week, and asked all those who were commonly classed as sinners to attend. He took a band of workers and visited every saloon, gambling-room and house of prostitution in that city, and made personal appeals to those he found. At the first service the church was crowded to the doors. Many of the people there had not been inside of a church since they were children. Dr. Mann, who is one of the leading Methodist ministers in the South, adopted radical measures, but sharing the disappointment of so many ministers of an evangelical spirit who do not through the ordinary agencies have the unconverted in their audiences, determined to see if by this unusual method he could not get a hearing among the non-professors of religion. He was in imitation of his Master, who in the parable said:

Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled. (Luke 14: 23.)

Dog Meat

Some time ago a proposition was made in Paris for the sale of dog meat, and a request was made that canine butcher shops be licensed. The idea is repugnant to so many that an earnest protest has been made to the licensing of this kind of shops. Certain members of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals protested against the wholesale slaughter of man's good friend. There is a difference of opinion among the physicians as to the injurious effect of dog meat on the human system. Some claim that the food is tough and indigestible, and even poisoned by the scavenger habits of the animal, and by its liability to disease; while others hold that in China, Japan, some parts of Germany, and in the Polar regions, the meat of the dog has been considered palatable and nutritious. Several of the physicians of Boston, interviewed recently, are of this opinion, but a large majority of physicians of France and America who have been interviewed hold that for sentimental and hygienic reasons the flesh of the dog should not be allowed for food. The restrictions of the Jewish law against unclean meat are very exacting. The laws of our land, though not so strict, are discriminating, and do not permit the flesh of the dog as food. When the Scribes and Pharisees and hypocrites laid so much stress on the refusal of unclean food as a religious duty Christ brushed their traditions aside and told them that the arbitrary notions of the cleanliness or uncleanliness of food had nothing to do with character, but that that was a question which was to be determined by the words that came out of the lips and the actions that proceeded from their lives.

Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man. (Matt. 15: 11.)

$2,500,000 an Ounce

Once it was possible to get radium at $2 a milligramme; now the market price is equal to $2,500,000 an ounce. Sir William Ramsay delivered a speech recently at the laying of the cornerstone of a new radium factory in Limehouse, an eastern suburb of London. The corporation is going to extract radium from pitchblende found in the Trenwith mine, Cornwall. A secret process has been discovered by Sir William Ramsay himself for the manufacture of radium. It is one of the romances of science that the material, in the old days, was regarded by the miners as a nuisance, preventing them from obtaining copper from smelting, and it was thrown out as worthless in the dumps or left underground. One reason why the radium is so very expensive is its great value to science, and the other is its scarcity. The total quantity which has been procured for scientific use throughout the world is estimated not to exceed a quarter of a pound. The good Book constantly compares the knowledge of God, which is wisdom, with the most precious material things in the world, and puts it beyond price.

For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. (Prov. 3: 14, 15.)

Expelled Bible From School

After a fight of two years Father Charles Logue of the Freeport Catholic school has succeeded in having the reading of the Bible in the public school at that place stopped. He laid his objections before Commissioner of Education Professor A. F. Draper, at Albany, with the result that an order prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the schools of Freeport was issued. The members of the School Board, and a majority of the parents of the children at that place, were in favor of the reading of the Bible. Samuel R. Smith, president of the Freeport Board of Education, declared that the religious exercises in the schools were always held before regular school hours, and that no child was compelled to attend them. It is expected that the case will be reopened, in which event it is hoped that the decision will be reversed. Childhood can nowhere find such ethics and morals as the Bible teaches, and its judicious reading, without comment, is the healthiest thing possible for the minds and souls of the children and the prosperity of the commonwealth. Luke pays a tribute to the intellectual and moral nobility produced by the reading of the Scriptures.

These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so. (Acts 17: 11.)

Threw Away Cripple Creek Mine

"Bob" Wormack, famed as the discoverer of Cripple Creek, died at Colorado Springs the other day in poverty, muttering his delirious hopes of a fortune just within reach of his fingers. His father, Robert Wormack, Sr., had hunted in vain for gold for forty years. He told his son before he died that he thought that gold would be found near Cripple Creek if he should keep up the search. He knew every inch of that region, for his horses and cattle ranged back of Pike's Peak, and his cabin stood upon a foundation of gold. For twenty years Wormack, with shovel and divining-rod, prospected for gold in his neighborhood. One day he hit the yellow ledge. His friends told him it was fool's gold. His brother-in-law and partner took it to the nearest assay office only after days of protest. He came back with the government certificate to show that the find averaged $1,100 to the ton. Wormack immediately staked out every claim throughout the length and breadth of the gold lead. In his exhilaration of joy he went into town one night, and got on a terrible spree. He spent all his nuggets of gold over a bar and at a roulette table. When his last nugget was gone, he sold all his claims for $500 in cash in order to make a final wager on the red, and he lost all and a week later was digging gold with a shovel for the man who had bought his right to one of the greatest mines the world has ever known. The last five years of his life he was an invalid. The last two he was confined to his bed, and was saved from starvation by an elder sister. The throwing away of the Cripple Creek mines over the bar and into the gambling device are trifling when compared with the millions of fortunes that have been lost over the saloon counter and the gambling table, and these are only the symbols of the reckless flinging away of spiritual treasures with nothing but disappointment and ruin in return. The Master refers to this physical and spiritual bankruptcy in the picture of the destitution of the prodigal.

And there wasted his substance with riotous living. (Luke 15: 13.)

THE "BREAD LINE" AND THE BASKET DINNER DISTRIBUTION AT THE BOWERY MISSION

These photographs, taken from the life, present familiar scenes at the Bowery Mission at the opening of winter. The "Bread Line" gives a one-o'clock A. M., breakfast of coffee and rolls to 2,000 to 2,500 unemployed and homeless men and lads, to cheer and strengthen them for their hunt for work. At Thanksgiving and Christmas "basket dinners," each calculated to feed five persons, are distributed to hundreds of pitifully poor families, who have first been visited and investigated by the Mission working staff. This year, the Thanksgiving "basket dinners," generously contributed by the readers of this journal toward the Mission's charity work, fed 1,000 grateful and overjoyed men, women and little children, including many invalids, not one of whom, but for this benevolent provision, would have had a Thanksgiving meal.

Woman Suffrage in Other Lands

THE moderate suffragists of England are deploring the recent ebullitions of the "suffragettes," which have given the cause of "votes for women" a decided setback. Throwing acids and cutting a prominent politician's head or hat with a dog-whip, however much he may have deserved it, are not the sort of tactics to commend any cause to the judicious. The English journal, Black and White, insists that such violence indicates insanity; that the suffragettes are, in the slang of the day, "obsessed," and that medical treatment is what they need far more than votes.

In our country, only a faint idea can be gained of the intensity of interest among educated and influential English women in the great movement for equal suffrage. The above picture of an English woman, escorted to jail by a good-natured policeman, is typical. Scores of her equally refined and intelligent sisters have suffered gladly a similar fate. She has probably interrupted a political meeting with some forbidden question, or has failed to "move on" when ordered to do so by the guardians of the peace.

Mrs. Pethwick Lawrence is one of the most famous of the suffrage leaders, related to several noble families, and herself a woman of intellect and enthusiasm. One of the most tumultuous crowds of the season greeted her upon her recent release from a considerable term of imprisonment in jail. She was showered with flowers, and the photograph shows her standing in her carriage and acknowledging beamingly the shouts and cheers of congratulating friends.

THE "MILITANT SUFFRAGETTE" MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND

A London Suffragette Under Arrest — Released from Jail and Among Friends

The London Sphere prints an attractive portrait of Miss Anna Rogstad, the first woman deputy member returned to the Norwegian Storthing. The face is that of a serious, kindly, middle-aged woman, shrewd and sensible, just the kind of person needed in all legislative assemblies. Miss Rogstad is a public school teacher. Her face indicates that she is a thorough and beloved one. In Norway, deputy members are elected to take the place of the regular members in case of illness or other disability. Without wishing harm to any honorable member of this distinguished body, it may be pretty surely guessed that the good of the country will be better served by the vote of Miss Rogstad than by that of the man for whom she is the substitute.

The town of Aldeburgh, in England, has for the second time elected Mrs. Garrett Anderson as Mayor. She is an elderly woman, of fine appearance, and, though short and stout like Queen Victoria, possesses also much of the determined dignity of that conscientious monarch. Mrs. Anderson attends church every Sunday, wearing her conspicuous Mayoral chain, and preceded by a macebearer, according to immemorial English custom. The London Illustrated News pays her many compliments, and says that the antics of the suffragettes are somewhat atoned for by the calm common sense of women like the Mayor of Aldeburgh.

Miss Mary Gray Peck, the charming and accomplished professor of English Literature, who has resigned her position in the University of Minnesota to become "headquarters secretary" to the National Suffrage Association, invites all who are interested to visit the headquarters, at 505 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Forty pamphlets and fifty-two leaflets are for sale there, all at a nominal price. Among the writers of the pamphlets are Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Jane Addams, Mrs. Catt, Ida Husted Harper, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Frances Squire Potter, Alice Stone Blackwell, Professor Raymond Phelan and Professor Nathaniel Schmidt.

Most of us have condemned the "suffragettes" as unwomanly. Even those of us who feel that equal suffrage is justice, have deplored the excesses of the "suffragettes" and have accused them of hurting the cause. But here comes their leader, Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, refined, gentle, modest, logical and restrained of speech, tasteful in dress, a beautiful lady, and she says in public, unreservedly, that the misdemeanors of her party have been wilfully and maliciously exaggerated. She expressly asserts, according to the New York Times, that no women have scratched or bitten policemen in England.

"What we women have done," she says, "is simply to tap a policeman gently on the face or to pull hs coat to prevent the humiliating struggle when he arrests us."

Mrs. Pankhurst's descriptions of the insults and provocations which have been heaped upon ladies, some of them young and beautiful, others gray-headed and infirm, simply for raising their voices in advocacy of votes for women, are claimed to justify all that those women have done. Yet it seems incredible that the many stories of suffragette violence should have been "made out of whole cloth," as the saying is. Probably Mrs. Pankhurst would say that some crazy women, entirely outside of the organization, are to blame for them all.

Bible and Picture Both Delight

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Many thanks for the beautiful picture. We like it very much, and expect to have it framed. I also thank you for sending the Bible to the other address. The young lady says it is beautiful and she appreciates it greatly and considers it a very appropriate birthday present.

CHRISTMAS DINNERS AND FUEL FOR DESTITUTE HOMES

THE following correspondence explains itself. At least one hundred very poor families on the populous West Side of New York will be gladdened as the result of this special gift through the Bowery Mission:

NEW YORK, November 30, 1909.

Rev. John Wesley Hill, D.D., Pastor Metropolitan Temple, Seventh Avenue and Fourteenth Street, City.

DEAR DR. HILL: After considering the suggestion of affording relief to some of the poorest families in your neighborhood, through a gift of fuel, instead of distributing baskets of Christmas dinners, as we do on the East Side, we have determined to appropriate $100 for the purpose, and thank you for kindly volunteering to act as almoner of the Bowery Mission in this connection.

The Bowery Mission has been greatly prospered this year, and we feel so grateful to our heavenly Father for the beautiful new home which he has given us that we are glad of every opportunity to give practical expression to our gratitude by bringing on Christmas Day a measure of happiness and comfort into lives that might otherwise be cheerless and hopeless.

We are very glad that our appropriations for outside work are liberal enough to enable us to include this share of your commendable work, and I take pleasure in enclosing a check for $100 to cover the expense involved. Very cordially yours, (Signed) LOUIS KLOPSCH.

The following is Rev. Dr. Hill's reply:

METROPOLITAN TEMPLE, FOURTEENTH STREET AND SEVENTH AVENUE.

NEW YORK, December 2, 1909.

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I want to thank you, both for myself, the Metropolitan Temple, and those who have been the recipients of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD beneficence, for the check which you sent us, with which to purchase coal for the poor of this vicinity.

The money will be most judiciously spent. The chairman of the Poor Committee will see to it that not one penny is unworthily bestowed. I know of some of these homes which are to be brightened and warmed through the generosity of the patrons and friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One of these homes is the mere shadow of past affluence. The husband and father, however, failed in business, subsequently died, and left a widowed mother with the care of her little ones. The battle has been grim, at times tragic; but up to this time the family has been held together. I can assure you that the ton of coal which will be sent to this home as a Christmas gift will make it a "Merry Christmas" indeed. I could recite many such instances, but time and space forbid.

I appreciate beyond measure the great work that you are accomplishing in the Bowery Mission, and the fact that your aims are so high and your spirit so broad that you can make it possible for your helpful influence to be felt in this part of the city. We are accomplishing much through the established agency of the Temple, but we cannot begin to meet the demands which are upon us, and your reinforcement is appreciated "more than much."

Sincerely yours, JOHN WESLEY HILL.

A Woman Soldier

SIXTY-SEVEN years ago a quiet woman was born, whose career has embraced far more than the average amount of romance and adventure.

She is Mrs. Kady C. Brownell, the custodian of the famous Jumel mansion, recently purchased and rehabilitated by New York patriotic societies.

Mrs. Brownell was married on March 28, 1861. Three days later her young husband, roused by the stirring first call for volunteers, felt constrained to enlist for the war. His bride was willing that he should go, but declared that she should accompany him.

She was the daughter of a British colonel, and was born in South Africa at the very moment when her father was fighting in a battle near by. Therefore she came honestly by her "fighting blood."

Her husband was sure that she would not be accepted, but the famous war-executive of Rhode Island, Governor Sprague, was so deeply moved by the eloquent plea which she made to be allowed to go with her husband that he said: "Madam, I believe you will make a good soldier, and will be an honor to our army."

He himself escorted this unique volunteer to Washington, where, in a uniform consisting of a blue blouse, red zouave knee-skirt and gray leggings, she joined her husband's regiment.

She was given the company's flag to carry, and is said to have looked like a handsome boy of fifteen in her picturesque costume, and with a jaunty cap perched on her short hair, above her pink-and-white face.

At a skirmish at Harper's Ferry, not long afterward, she was under fire, and proved that she was as brave as she was pretty. She never flinched at the whistling of the bullets nor the crash of the artillery.

At Bull Run she was wounded in the arm, and her flag was cut and torn by bullets.

After three months' service, she and her husband were honorably discharged. At once they re-enlisted in the Fourth Rhode Island regiment, and went back into action.

During this period, says the New York American, she performed a wonderful feat of daring and presence of mind. Her regiment was forming for a charge. In the smoke it was mistaken by a companion regiment, the Fifth Rhode Island, for a part of the Confederate Army, and the Fifth began to fire upon the Fourth.

Mrs. Brownell sensed the situation at once, and, heedless of flying bullets, rushed out into the open, waving her flag. Instantly the bewildered soldiers of the Fifth saw their blunder and ceased firing.

In this fight Mr. Brownell was wounded. His wife was detailed to watch him, and when he recovered they were both honorably discharged.

Mrs. Brownell is a member of the Grand Army, and attends the celebrations of the Elias Howe Post, No. 4, of Connecticut. By a special act of Congress she has been granted a pension. Four years ago she was constituted a caretaker of the Jumel mansion. Her husband is employed in the Department of Public Works.

At her birthday party Mrs. Brownell will appear in her full uniform, as worn during her honorable career as color-sergeant.

Nothing has Pleased so Much

Dear Christian Herald: To-day I received the "Dreamland" calendar and the picture, "The Daughters of Dorcas." Nothing we have received from you in years has pleased us so much. They are beautiful! Mother says they must be framed. Thank you very, very much for them, and your words of greeting.

Tim's Kit

By Mary Barton Cookman

IT surprised the shiners and newsboys around the postoffice the other day to see "Limpy Tim" come among them, and, in a quiet way, to hear him say:

"Boys, I want to sell my kit. Here's two brushes, a hull box o' blacking, a good stout box, and the hull outfit goes for two shillin'."

"Goin' away, Tim?" queried one.

"Not eszackly, boys; but I want a quarter the awfullest kind, just now."

"Goin' on a scursion?" asked another.

"Not to-day; but I must have a quarter," he answered.

One of the lads passed over the money, and took the kit. Tim walked straight to the counting-room of a daily paper, put down his money, and said:

"I guess I kin write it, if you'll give me a pencil."

With slow moving fingers he wrote a death notice. It went into the paper almost as he wrote it, but you may not have seen it. He wrote:

"Died—Little Ted, of scarlet fever; aged 3 yeres. Funeral to-morrer; gon up to Hevin; left won brother."

"Was it your brother?" asked the cashier.

Tim tried to brace up, but he couldn't. The big tears came up, his chin quivered, and he pointed to the notice on the counter and gasped:

"I—I had to sell my kit to do it, b-but he had his arms around my neck when he d-died!"

He hurried away home, but the news reached the boys somehow, and they gathered in a group and talked. Tim had not been home an hour before a bare-footed boy left the kit on the doorstep, and in the box was a bouquet of flowers, which had been purchased in the market by pennies contributed by the crowd of ragged but big-hearted urchins.

Did God ever make a heart which would not respond, if the right chord was touched?

Everyone Was Thankful

ONE of the most impressive sights ever witnessed at the Bowery Mission occurred on Thanksgiving night. Gathered in the beautiful auditorium were about three hundred men of the Bowery. Many of them were homeless, nearly all of them cold, for a chilling sleet had been falling all day; practically all were hungry. For weeks some of them had not been able to remove their shoes from their tired, swollen feet. To many the dark hallways or an empty truck had offered the only shelter for months, perhaps, and so late at night they had crawled into one or the other and snatched a few hours of restless sleep.

In the crowd at the Mission were the old and the young. To some of them, perhaps, it was the first Thanksgiving away from the old home; to others, it was no new experience. What had those poor unfortunate men to be thankful for? What single joy did life hold for them? Can a man give thanks for an empty stomach? And yet, when "Mother Bird" arose and asked, in her sweet, pleading voice, for those who wished to be remembered in the prayer of Thanksgiving to stand, every man, young and old, rose to his feet.

"This act on the part of the men," said Superintendent Hallimond afterward, "was perfectly spontaneous. It no doubt sounds somewhat incredible that these poor fellows—bereft of almost every comfort of life—are a thousand times more grateful than the majority of their more fortunate neighbors, but it is perfectly true."

Those who, at this season, forget the source of their blessings may learn a lesson of thankfulness from the poor, homeless men and lads of the Bowery Mission.

THE STRAWBERRY HANDKERCHIEF

A TALE OF COLONIAL DAYS IN OLD NEW YORK

BY

AMELIA E. BARR

ARENT eloquently pictured the life of a sailor. He made Rose and Virginia see the clouds of spray, the swelling sails, and the bending masts of his own good ship, the Manhattan. He showed them the treacherous waters unquiet and raving with sinister malignity; some one big wave, compact as a wall, charging her with the velocity of a horse regiment; folding its livid gloom over her, and shutting away the sight of the outer world; "but the gallant little ship," he said, "just bared her breast to the storm, won her way in spite of wind and wave, and brought her charge of life and treasure safe to harbor. Well, then," he added, "there are hours when I really think the dear thing has a soul. Yes, indeed, I do!"

No word had been said about Rose's beauty, but she would not have changed the conversation for the finest compliment ever made to woman. For Arent had infectious enthusiasms.

He was good and great in his own sphere, and he made those who listened to him feel good and great. Unconsciously passionate and poetic, he had at once the beautiful humility and the splendid imaginations which belong to a truly romantic love. So though the Captain slept—or pretended to sleep—one whole hour, no one wished to awaken him. Certainly the Stamp Act was likely to be the tragedy of two countries, and the three young people were not unmindful, or uninterested, in it; but a national tragedy is never so individually important, or so interesting, as the private melodrama of our own daily life.

Fortunately, before the subject lost a particle of its romance, it was changed by the advent of Lieutenant Artaveldt. He came riding down the Broadway like a prince of maiden dreams; a soldierly cavalier on a great white horse, whose trappings shone with silver. He was handsomely dressed in an English riding suit of broadcloth, and he wore a silver-hilted sword and a little cocked beaver, which he tucked under his arm when he had dismounted at the Van Vroom gate. In his six feet of splendid manhood, there was not one ounce of superfluous flesh; for Nature, intending him for a man of war, had stripped him for the conflict, tightened every muscle and nerve, and sent the crimson blood in full tides through manifest arteries. Sun and wind and exposure of all kinds had bronzed and colored his face, which was lean and sharp, but tremulous withal, just as a fine blade is tremulous.

He came forward with the slight swagger which is the manner some really modest men assume when women are watching them. Bareheaded, his sword tilted with masterful grace and impudence, his steps ringing on the stone path with military precision, he advanced with a prideful confidence he had fairly won.

For while only a lad of twenty years old he had marched with that victorious band who under Colonel Peter Schuyler entered Montreal when that city surrendered in 1760; and the year before had been one of the gallant five thousand who, on the plains of Abraham, ended forever the long French war and gave Canada to England. For to go to the army had seemed as natural to him as to go to school, and no one who looked at Joris Artaveldt could for a moment doubt that he was destined for the tremendous pilgrimage of the sword.

Arent, also, had been no mean fighter, but the evidences in his case were secondary; his great conflicts with the elemental forces of nature being immensely dominant over those made equal by their human limitations. So Arent was the incarnation of the sea—of its illimitable spaces, and its impenetrable mysteries; while Artaveldt bore on every lineament the red sign manual of the battlefield. Lady Rose was quick to see the difference.

"They are two as fine men as I shall ever meet," she thought, "but they are not of a piece; the sailor is the finer of the two—but in faith I am almost distracted between them!"

"Riding down Broadway like a prince of maiden dreams"

Very soon after Artaveldt's arrival, the talk and laughter in the front garden arrested the attention of the Captain. He sat up wide awake and looked at the Madame, who was knitting not far away, the nap-napping of her needles making a pretty accompaniment to the twittering of the birds in the vines.

"Katrina," he said, "that talking and laughing in the front of the house, what means it?"

"It means that the children are happy. Twice I have heard Arent laugh—so merry as a little boy he laughed. That is good."

"And pretty soon, now, Madame Von Block comes driving this way; no more she makes of women's good names than a mower makes of the grass. Thou speak to them."

Then Madame rose, and going through the wide hall of the house, she stood at the open front door and called Virginia.

"Thy father is afraid of Anita Von Block's tongue," she said, "and there is a damp wind blowing from the river. Come into the house, and mind this, Virginia: if father will talk of the King, and the tax, and the meeting last night, ask Joris Artaveldt to tell the story. In a few words he will tell it." And Virginia smiled and nodded her handsome head.

"I will ask Joris," she answered.

The cold wind from the river had touched the Captain also. Madame found him in his chair by the fireside directing the making of the fire. "Like the firing of a gun the wind came down from the north," he said. "Are the children coming in?"

Arent and Rose entered as he spoke, and in a few minutes Virginia and Artaveldt followed. The Captain looked at them suspiciously. Virginia had some yellow crocus twined with ivy upon her breast, and the jealous father told himself they had not been placed there without some foolish words. He knew it from the dreamy look in Virginia's eyes, and from the light on Artaveldt's face; for the light which falls on the face of a man from the face of a woman that loves him, can never be mistaken for any other light. Ah! but there should be another name, blessed and beautiful, for this soul illumination, seen only on the faces of the loving and the beloved!

Rose had lifted her tatting, and Arent sat at her side. Virginia went aimlessly to her work-basket; she was not thinking of hemstitching. Madame's fingers were busy with her knitting needles, but her eyes were taking note of every one, and every thing. She was anxious for somebody to begin a sensible conversation. She looked at Arent, but Arent was talking to Rose in a low voice, and Rose was laughing softly and answering him with glances from her beautiful eyes. Virginia was lost in reverie, and every moment the Captain was more likely to revert to the morning's interrupted conversation.

Suddenly Artaveldt interposed. He lifted himself erect and said in a tone of pleasant exaltation:

"We are going to have a race on our course next Monday. Captain, my father desires your presence." And then with a bow to Madame: "I trust the ladies and Arent will also honor us so far."

There was instantly a great excitement, for a race of any kind, even at that early date, was irresistible to a New Yorker. Not only had the colonists all the hippic enthusiasm of the mother country; they also had an ardor for betting that knew no bounds. So Artaveldt was beset with eager inquiries. What horses were to run? Who was to ride them? Would there be a large company? and the stakes, were they worth while, or merely honorable and nominal?

During these and other questions Artaveldt stood on the hearth, the center of interest, his face beaming, his eyes flashing delight, his hands restlessly emphasizing all the said:

"My father's new mare, Corisande," he answered, "is to be matched against a horse General Wingate has just brought from Kentucky."

"Who will ride Wingate's horse?" asked the Captain.

"Jack Carpenter. He is a jockey in ten thousand. If thirty horses were in a race, he could tell with one of his Parthian glances what they were all doing."

"He could not. I do not believe such tales. But Wingate knows a good horse, and a good jockey; a great turfman is Wingate."

"My father says he is to be made one of the King's Council in New York."

"So? Well, he is good for nothing else."

"And who rides Corisande?" asked Madame.

"I intend to ride her myself."

Rose looked at the amateur jockey with approval, and cried "Bravo!" Virginia gave him one bright glance, but did not speak. The Captain laughed with good humor. "I like your spirit, Joris," he said, "but you will be beat."

"I think not. The Kentucky horse has tremendous speed, but no innate gameness."

STILL FOLLOWING THE STAR*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE centre and crowning part of the world was thought by the ancient Romans to be the Aureum Milliarium, the Golden Mile Stone, set up in Rome by the Emperor Augustus. From it radiated roads leading to every part of the Roman empire. Not the Golden Milestone, but the Golden Star, which the Lord of all the earth set in the sky when Christ was born, marked the centre and crowning part of the world as it shone upon the place where the young Child lay in Bethlehem. And since the first pilgrimage of the wise men to that little town many are the travelers from every part of the world who have gone thither.

The Wise Men and the Star

And how far that star threw its beam upon the world that it should be seen by those living more than a thousand miles away, and who had long been watching for it, and who rejoiced when they saw it and traversed mountain and desert to follow its leading! How came they to know anything about that star?

Why were they watching for it? Who were they? They were of the Magi, a priestly caste among the ancient Persians. We first read of them in the Bible in the book of Jeremiah (chapter 39:3, 13), but under the name of Rab-mag. Zoroaster was a leader among them, and it is supposed that he learned from Jeremiah about the promised Messiah and about the star that should herald Him. To the Magi the heavens were an open book; they read stars as we read words, consequently a new star was at once recognized by them. Zoroaster had said to his followers:

"You, my sons, will perceive it rising before any other nation. As soon as you see the star, follow it wherever it leads you, and adore the mysterious child, offering your gifts to him with the profoundest humility."

We must not leave out of the calculation that God himself had been speaking to them in their hearts, leading them to long for his divine appearance upon the earth in the person of the Lord Jesus.

And so when the Magi saw the star they not only rejoiced with exceeding great joy, but they sought the place where they might find the holy Child. And true to the injunctions of their master Zoroaster, delivered six hundred years before, they gathered together their gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh to lay as tribute at his feet: "Myrrh to a mortal, gold to a king, frankincense to God."

Tradition says there were three of them, and names them Melchior, Balthazar and Caspar. Certain it is that they rode upon camels, for in no other way could they have crossed the desert of Arabia, which lay between their home and Palestine.

Jerusalem was quite accustomed to the sight of strange people, but hardly had such as the Magi ever been seen within its borders. Travel-stained as they must have been, they were recognized as having come from far away. Their dignified and wise bearing claimed almost reverent attention. The gifts with which they were laden proclaimed them to be men of affairs in contrast to the beggars who found their way often to Jerusalem. The prompt way in which they announced themselves and their errand showed that they were men of action. Plainly in our day they would have been called "distinguished visitors."

The Well of the Magi, where the Camels and Their Drivers Yet Pause for Rest

They made a stir in Jerusalem, which reached even to the palace of the king, and from him to the hierarchy—the Scribes and chief priests. Palace and temple were alike concerned. Probably for the first time in his life, King Herod read the Bible, or had it read to him, when he inquired of the chief priests where Christ should be born, that he might reply to the question which the Magi had asked of him. That day king and priests read from the book of Micah, chapter 5:2. Soon it was told that a rival king was born, and it is said that "the king was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him."

But the Magi demanded an answer to their question, and it was given to them by King Herod himself, in private audience. He sought, however, to hide his feelings from them by telling them that they would find the newborn King in Bethlehem—only six miles away—and that it was his desire also to do homage to him, and requested them to bring him word when they had found him. Even in those days a man, a king, could smile and be a villain!

Route to Bethlehem as It Appears To-day

The Journey to Bethlehem

Then the Magi mounted their camels again and turned them toward Bethlehem, and the star, which they saw in the East, went before them till it came and stood over where the young child was. Once when this story was told to a little four-your-old boy he remarked: "I think that star must have been on the end of God's finger."

Then they came into the house where they saw the young Child, with Mary his mother. There before him they laid their treasures of praise and rich gifts, and departed for their far-away home, not returning by way of Jerusalem to tell King Herod where he might find the new-born King, because God, who knows what is in the heart of man, had warned them not to return to Herod. Herod shortly afterward, learning that the Child was in Bethlehem, strangely "worshiped" him by sending his soldiers down to Bethlehem to kill him, and to be quite sure that he should not escape he ordered that a bloody net should be spread by the killing of all children of two years old and under. We were shown a small chapel in Bethlehem, a shrine dedicated to the children who thus perished. It is no wonder that everywhere are beautiful stars for decorations; how could it be otherwise when it was a star that led the Magi to Jesus? Some of the Christmas stars are red, and others are green, according to what they are made of.

One day I thought of a new kind of Christmas star. Five little girls had come to the platform to recite their verses at a Christmas festival. Each one carried a different kind of wreath: the first had a wreath of holly, and she compared its pretty red berries to "gladness, love and praise." The second girl had a wreath of roses, and she spoke about Jesus being the Rose of Sharon. The third girl had a sparkling wreath, which she compared with the light of Bethehem's star. The fourth girl had a wreath of cedar, and she had something to say about the "Gospel tree that sprang at Jesus' birth to bless the whole round earth." The last girl had a wreath of immortelles (flowers that never wilt and die), and she spoke about the life in heaven with Jesus, where there would be no more death. And then I thought how beautiful it would be to make a star—a five-pointed star—one point of holly, one point of roses, one point of sparkling silver, one point of cedar, and one point of immortelles.

I suppose the reason I thought about making such a star was that only a few days before I had been reading about a man who had given a star to the Grand Army of the Republic, which he had made of many kinds of wood from historical places. But the best use of stars is to help us remember Jesus.

Pointing the Way

The Bible has many, many verses in it that are like stars pointing the way to Jesus. In the Red Letter Bible, published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, each one of these verses has a red star beside it; the first one will be found in Gen. 3:15. It contains words which were like a star pointing Adam and Eve to Jesus. The next star is in Gen. 9:27: it pointed out to Noah the way to Jesus. The next star is in Gen. 12:3: it pointed Abram the way to Jesus, etc. How interesting to hunt up all of these stars in the Red Letter Bible, and read them all, and keep count of them all!

The silent skies are full of speech
  For who hath ears to hear;
The winds are whispering each to each,
The moon is calling to the beach,
And stars their sacred wisdom teach
  Of faith and love and fear.

But once the sky the silence broke,
  And song o'erflowed the earth;
The midnight air with glory shook
And angels mortal language spoke,
When God our human nature took
  In Christ the Saviour's birth.

And Christmas once is Christmas still;
  The gates through which he came,
And forests wild and murmuring rill,
And fruitful field and breezy hill,
And all that else the wide world fill,
  Are vocal with His name.

Shall we not listen while they sing
  This latest Christmas morn
And music bear in everything,
And faithful lives in tribute bring
To the great song which greets the King,
  Who comes when Christ is born?

—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

Keeping Christmas Everywhere

In Norway and Sweden the birds have Christmas, as well as folks. Two or three days before Christmas whole cartloads of oat-sheaves are brought into the towns. Rich and poor alike buy these sheaves, some larger and some smaller, and bunches are made and placed everywhere out of doors, on trees and hedges, on roofs of houses and barns.

In Russia, on Christmas morning, the children are awakened by the cry "Baboushka!" Who is Baboushka? The Russian peasants say she is an old woman who was at work in her house when the wise men from the East passed on their way to find the Christ-child. "Come with us," they said, "we have seen his star in the East, and go to worship him." "I will come, but not now," she said; "I have my house to set in order. When that is done, I will follow and find him." So she turned back into her house, and finished her work, but when she would have set forth the three wise men were gone and had passed out of sight across the desert, and the star shone no more in the darkened heavens. She never saw the Christ-child, but she still wanders abroad, looking for him, and it is for his sake that she takes good care of little children at Christmas time.

A Plea for Fun

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WE are by way of being too serious and too strenuous, of taking ourselves too much in earnest and of forgetting that fun is healthful and legitimate. "The merry heart doeth good like a medicine." For this we have the authority of Scripture. "The merry heart goes all the way, the sad one tires in a mile." This we are told by the greatest of modern poets. Why so much admiration is lavished on mere gravity of demeanor, why it is considered peculiarly virtuous to wear a long face and speak in subdued tones on ordinary occasions is a puzzle beyond solution. The fact is that fun is wholesome. Light-hearted laughter that springs from a soul in which there is no malice is contagious, and helps to oil the rusty machinery of domestic routine. There is little friction in a home where there is sweetness, sincerity and fun. People who are born without a sense of humor, people to whom jests must be explained and who never see the comedy of life because they are so occupied with its tragedy, are much to be pitied. In every commonplace day there are droll situations and amusing incidents and chances for diversion, if only we have eyes to see, ears to hear, and a brain to interpret the fun that sparkles about us and ripples in the sunshine and makes glad the earth.

Of course, there are times and seasons and experiences in which laughter is impossible and unbecoming. To laugh when a friend tumbles down appears to be the irresistible temptation that assails six persons out of seven, yet there is really nothing funny in an unlucky fall. The fun, at any rate, is not evident to the victim of the accident. Fun at a funeral is out of place, and so is fun at a prayer meeting. Still, by a law of incongruity, if anything funny occurs in an hour when devotion is at concert pitch and sympathy strained to the uttermost, few of us are able to escape its influence, and some of us have not grace to behave as we should. In church, or in any worshiping assembly, the disposition to laugh should be checked. The utmost that can be permitted to human weakness in a place set apart for devotion is an evanescent smile, yet the man in the pulpit often sees from that vantage ground incidents in the aisles or the pews that shake his self-control, and the demurest occupant of a pew may possibly be upset by a trifle that would not amuse her anywhere else.

As a remedial measure fun is as successful in some cases as quinine, while it may be as stimulating in others as cayenne pepper or a mustard poultice. An invalid who was losing ground daily, growing weaker and weaker, taking no interest in her own recovery and apparently drifting out on the tide where life ebbs away, was in desperate danger until somebody suggested the sending for a certain Aunt Jemima. "If Aunt Jemima were here she could rouse her." The invalid's family, ready to grasp at any straw, the invalid's doctor, open to counsel from any quarter, and the invalid's nurse, completely worn out, united in sending for Aunt Jemima. The dear lady came, with her jolly laugh, her whimsical speech and her movements quick as the glancing of a bird from bough to bough. One would have thought her presence the least likely in the world to suit the quiet of a sick-room. In fact, its quiet fled before her; but she aroused the invalid, coaxed back the waning vitality, and largely through fun and good cheer made the sick one well.

THE LION ROARS

Fierce is the roar of the lion,
Deep in the jungle he prowls.
Who wouldn't be frightened and shudder
When an angry lion growls?

But mother is comforting Sally:
"There isn't a thing to fear,
For Bob is the make-believe lion—
Only your brother, my dear."

Flowers for the Table

A touch of refinement and elegance is added to the plainest table if a vase of flowers be set in the centre of the board. The flowers should always be fresh, nothing being so repulsive both to sight and smell as faded and withered blossoms. For the purpose of table decoration sweet peas and nasturtiums excel other flowers. They bloom profusely, their tints are beautiful, and the more one picks the more one has of these favorite flowers. Nasturtiums, with their brilliant flame color, should have the relief of green leaves here and there amid their bloom, and they appear to best advantage in a vase small at the bottom and flaring at the top. Sweet peas may be placed in a cut-glass or silver vase, and preferably their colors should be blended. They come in so many varieties of white, pink, lavender and purple that a bouquet of them is an unfailing delight.

Other flowers, such as lilies, roses and geraniums, lend beauty to the table. Wild flowers, from the day of the daisy to that of the goldenrod and Queen Anne's lace, are well chosen for the ornamentation of the table. When a table is set with a clean, well-laundered cloth, and with dishes that are whole, neither chipped nor mismated, however plain, and when flowers decorate the centre and smile their welcome to every one from the grandfather to the baby, they have an effect of toning up the family manners. They supply the keynote. It would be out of harmony for the boys to come to the table without washing their hands, and the girls to forget the dainty ribbon and the well-ordered hair that belong to them, when the table is beautifully set around a bunch of flowers.

Nervous Spendthrifts

ALICE KATHERINE FALLOWS, a daughter of Bishop Samuel Fallows, of Chicago, has recently published three attractive and useful books, apparently in line with the teachings of what is known as Emmanuel healing. These little books are full of admirable suggestions for the overtired and nervous women of our day. They are issued with the imprint of A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago, and the titles are The Point of View, Mental Hygiene in Everyday Living and A Talk On Relaxation. From the latter a quotation is made for the benefit of many readers of this page.

"Use a bed at night, not for the incomplete rest that many get, whose heads unconsciously are held on their pillows, and whose bodies are rigid with unnecessary muscular contraction, but for that delicious, refreshing rest that one may see any day in a comfortable family puss, completely surrendered to the comfort of a soft corner, without a trace of tension from the end of a gray nose to the tip of a furry tail. Such a relaxed giving up of one's self to an inviting bed means much more refreshing sleep through the night, much greater capacity for work in the morning.

"With a few simple suggestions like these, our visitor at the clinic departed. When she reported the next week, she walked in quietly, and there was a much more rested look on her face. After the exercises, which she did less strenuously than usual, in reply to a comment on her improved appearance she said: 'Relaxation acts like a charm with me. I have actually done more work this week than last, and had many more difficulties to meet, but I am not nearly so tired. Economizing nerve-force pays.'

"Assuredly, economizing nerve-force does pay. So many of the suffering ones who come to the church clinics to find relief have their wasteful spending of nervous energy to thank for their condition; so many more throughout the country are wretched for the same reason, that it would be a good thing for this intense generation, wherever it wanders, to have to face warning signs like these: 'Don't be a nervous spendthrift. Bankruptcy is torture.' 'Don't use a sledge hammer to drive a tack.' 'Hurry less and work more.' 'Worry is a slave-driver. Don't be its slave.' 'Do the day's work, then forget it.'"

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—J. J. The lady was quite right in her omission to invite you in when you escorted her home from the church sociable. You are at liberty to call upon her within a week or two, if you choose.

—JULIA. You ask whether trained skirts are to be fashionable in the coming season. Aunt Prudence is happy to tell you that short skirts are decreed for outdoor wear at present, and that the length of a walking dress will be very sensible, some four inches from the ground being the order from Paris. Trailing skirts are beautiful for ceremonious occasions in the house and for evening dress.

—THERESA C. You are expecting to be married quietly at the parsonage, with only the members of your family present. You ask whether an invitation should be sent to the family of the groom to be present on the occasion, and you doubt the necessity, as they live at a distance. They should certainly be invited. To omit the invitation would be to show unfriendliness. No doubt they will come if they can. Your second question concerns a later reception at your own home. This will be very pleasant, and no one in the village need be offended, although it was not your desire to have any except your near kindred at the ceremony.

Our Blanket Distribution at Monterey

THIS photograph, taken at the American Consulate, Monterey, Mexico, expressly for this journal and forwarded to us by Consul-General Hanna, shows, far better than any verbal or written description can show, the class of people who are the beneficiaries of the generous benevolence of our readers. These blankets, of which we have sent 20,000 to Monterey thus far, are probably the most welcome gifts that could have been chosen for these poor Mexican mothers, who, as Mr. Hanna has explained, are really destitute, their homes and all their little household belongings having been swept off by the terrible flood.

Satisfaction and heartfelt gratitude are depicted on the faces of the women in the photograph, and there can be little doubt that many a prayer goes up from those simple hearts, invoking blessings on the kind American friends who have remembered them in their time of distress. We are glad to learn from our Consul-General that food in large quantities has been contributed in this country and sent across the border and that there is no longer danger of the unfortunate people of Monterey suffering from starvation.

SCIENCE MAY SOON CONQUER PAIN

Professor Jonnesco of Bucharest and His Wonderful Experiments With Stovaine, tne New Anæsthetic

By SAMUEL G. TRACY, B.Sc., M.D., New York

THE recent reports in the press of the remarkable results obtained by Professor Jonnesco, of Bucharest, with the use of the new anæsthetic, stovaine, combined with strychnine sulphate, have attracted world-wide attention among both physicians and laymen. The remarkable feature of this new chemical compound is that, when injected into the spinal canal, it will produce anæsthesia, or a loss of the sense of feeling, without rendering the patient unconscious. In this state, serious major operations may be performed under its influence, and the patient will retain all his senses except that of feeling.

Stovaine, chemically called the hydrochlorate of amyline, was discovered in 1902 by the well-known French chemist, Eduard Fourneau. It consists of small crystalline white scales, soluble in water and alcohol. It was first used as an anæsthetic by Drs. Billon and Lannoy of France in 1903. Many physicians and surgeons abroad, and some in this country, have conducted exhaustive experiments with stovaine for several years. These results show that it possesses local anæsthetic properties equal to cocaine, but is not so poisonous; and the general anæsthetic effects, when used hypodermically, are equal to the inhalations of chloroform or ether.

In 1904 Dr. F. Billon was the first to report in the French medical press his experiments with stovaine in the production of what practically amounted to a general anæsthesia. That is, his patients became insensible to pain, although they retained their consciousness. His method was as follows: A patient whom it was found necessary to operate upon was placed in a sitting posture, a hypodermic needle or syringe was introduced into the lower part of the spinal canal (between the first and second or the second and third lumbar vertebra) and a small quantity of spinal fluid withdrawn, a similar amount of stovaine solution being injected. The drug began to take effect in from five to fifteen minutes, as was shown by the muscular paralysis and a loss of sensation. The effects of the stovaine extended several inches above the point of injection and almost as far down as the feet. At the same time the patient maintained his mentality and was conscious of all his surroundings.

This method of producing anæsthesia with a loss of sensation, without affecting the consciousness, is considered one of the greatest discoveries in surgery since Dr. W. T. Morton first demonstrated the anæsthetic properties of ether. Dr. Morton had previously experimented with ether in dentistry, but on October 1, 1846, he first successfully administered it to a patient at the Massachusetts General Hospital. It was a great success, and Dr. Warren, of Boston, operated on the patient, who felt no pain, and made a good recovery. In November, 1847, Sir J. Y. Simpson first announced chloroform as an anæsthetic, and it has since been much used by the surgeons in the British Isles. In 1800, Sir Humphry Davy, while experimenting with nitrous oxide, commonly called "laughing gas," observed its anæsthetic effects, and even suggested its use in surgery; but nothing came of this suggestion till nearly half a century later, when Horace Wells, of Hartford, Conn., successfully employed this gas for the painless extraction of teeth.

Professor Jonnesco

Thus far the application of stovaine as a spinal anæsthetic is not considered a perfect success by surgeons in general. During the past few years numerous physicians, among them Dr. O. Munchmeyer of Germany, Dr. P. Hardonin of France, Dr. J. H. Pringle of Scotland, and Dr. Barker of England, have been using stovaine in place of chloroform or ether, with more or less success, dependent upon the condition of the patient and the skill of the surgeon. Dr. Munchmeyer used stovaine in 1,189 cases. Of this large number 70 per cent. were free from any bad after effects, and about 30 per cent. had continual headache and vomiting for several days. A few (seven in all) had paralysis of the legs, which lasted a few days or even a week. Nevertheless, Dr. Munchmeyer said he considered stovaine a very valuable anæsthetic, especially in cases where it was dangerous to use chloroform or ether.

Dr. J. H. Pringle reported the use of stovaine in 100 cases. His results were not as good as the others. He had the misfortune to have fifteen failures, in which no anæsthesia was produced, and in seven cases only partial success was attained. Several of his patients suffered from bad after-effects, no worse, however, than chloroform or ether would have produced. In noting the report of these cases it must be remembered that these surgeons used stovaine alone, and did not offset some of the poisonous effects by suitable doses of strychnine. Until the recent experiments of Professor Jonnesco stovaine had not been used as an anæsthetic where the operation was situated in the upper part of the body. This precaution was observed lest the drug might partially paralyze the respiratory or heart action and thus jeopardize the life of the patient.

Fortunately, within the past few months, Professor Jonnesco found that by fortifying the system with strychnine at the time of the operation it partially neutralized the poisonous effects of the stovaine, and thus operations could be performed in the upper part of the body with comparative safety. This claim of Professor Jonnesco was confirmed by a series of several hundred operations, performed at the Bucharest Hospital, and also by several applications of the stovaine-strychnine to produce spinal anæsthesia at the Seaman's Hospital at Greenwich, England. His method of producing spinal anæsthesia is similar to that already described. In the average case, in operations on the lower part of the body, he uses ten centigrammes, or about one and three-fifth grains, of stovaine, and one milligramme, or about one sixty-second of a grain, of strychnine. This will keep the patient insensible to pain for about two hours. In operations on the upper part of the body, he uses three centigrammes, or about one-half grain, of stovaine, and half a milligramme, or one one-hundred-and-twenty-fifth of a grain, of strychnine. The anæsthesia from this dose lasts about three-quarters of an hour.

Dr. Jonnesco's last operation under this form of anæsthesia took place in London November 19. In the presence of forty surgeons he injected the stovaine and strychnine into the spinal canal of a patient. Anæsthesia, with a complete loss of sensation, was manifest in five minutes, and a tuberculous tumor was removed from the man's neck. During the operation the patient was fully conscious and he talked pleasantly with the surgeons and those about him. He said he felt absolutely no pain, and was very comfortable throughout the operation.

Americans will join forces to any great extent, they will prove a thorn in the flesh to Zelaya.

The animosity of Nicaragua to Americans dates from the time when the Panama route for a canal was taken. Since then, at first secretly and then more openly, the Nicaraguans did everything possible to harass the Americans within their borders. Now that America's long-tested patience is exhausted we may see a "new day" in Nicaragua, with a stable government, such as is found in Cuba.

Heretofore, surgeons who have used stovaine have limited their operations to the lower part of the body, and considered it unwise to use it in the aged, debilitated, or in children. Now, however, since Dr. Jonnesco's method, with the use of strychnine, has proved comparatively safe operations may be performed on any part of the body. It is likely this form of anæsthesia will prove a great boon to medical science and even a greater service to all mankind. Its use will prevent an incalculable amount of actual pain and will overcome, in a large degree, the dread that many patients have to submitting to a surgical operation.

While there is no known method of producing general anæsthesia which is absolutely safe in every case, the results already obtained with stovaine and strychnine would rather indicate that this method in a great many cases is as safe as chloroform or ether; in fact, I have no doubt Dr. Jonnesco considers it safer.

In view of Dr. Jonnesco's success no doubt many surgeons will now administer strychnine to patients who take stovaine for anæsthetic purposes, and it will be only a short time before a large number of reports will be on file. Reference to these future reports will enable the physician and surgeon to arrive at a more definite conclusion as to the value of stovaine, plus strychnine, as an anæsthetic. If Dr. Jonnesco's claims are confirmed by further experience with the use of this wonderful anæsthetic, the importance of the discovery can hardly be overestimated and he will certainly be hailed as one of the greatest benefactors of the age. In this case the general employment of stovaine and strychnine will relieve the surgeon of great embarrassment, and operations of a most difficult and delicate nature will be undertaken, with little fear of serious consequences. In fact, some of these operations would not otherwise be attempted. Much suffering will be alleviated and many lives saved. Further, as the technique of administration of Dr. Jonnesco's method is perfected, no doubt the death rate from stovaine and strychnine will be less than from the use of ether or chloroform.

Professor Tommaso Jonnesco is a Roumanian, and dean of the medical faculty of Bucharest University. He arrived in New York lately on the North German Lloyd steamship Kronprinzessin Cecilie, and will remain here two months, giving demonstrations of the use of the new drug, stovaine, before hospital clinics and medical societies. Dr. Tracy, who wrote the article on the subject for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, met the distinguished scientist shortly after his arrival and discussed with him the wonders and uses of the new anæsthetic. He says that during the past eighteen months he has successfully used stovaine and strychnine anæsthesia in 785 cases without a single death. Queen Elizabeth of Roumania (the celebrated "Carmen Sylva" of European literature), who is suffering from some glandular affection of the neck, has decided to have an operation performed by Professor Jonnesco when he returns to Budapest.

Great Benevolences

THE munificent prize of $100,000, offered by a Yale alumnus for the discovery of a consumption cure that will prove its efficacy during a test of five years, will doubtless stir the medical faculty to renewed exertions in their search for a remedy for this dread disease. An advisory board of distinguished medical experts will be the judges of the cures submitted. Let us hope the golden reward will soon be earned.

The death, at the age of ninety-eight, of Mr. John Masterson Burke, the New York millionaire philanthropist, will make immediately available the fund of $4,000,000 which he set aside for the establishment and maintenance of a Home for Convalescents. The foundation of this institution—which is to be named after his mother, Winifred Masterson Burke—was organized in his lifetime, the actual work being deferred until his demise. It is a noble project, and will be a blessing to thousands.

Teach the Girls Dressmaking WITH McCALL PATTERNS

McCall Pattern No. 3146

There must be some very good reason for the fact that American women buy more McCall Patterns than they do of any other one make.

There are several good reasons. No woman who makes her own clothing and that of her children wants to struggle with a complicated, hard-to-understand pattern.

The average woman isn't a trained dressmaker—she wants practical, simple patterns, and McCall Patterns meet her requirements precisely and unfailingly.

Any woman can understand them without the slightest difficulty. There is no way to make mistakes or go wrong. No charts or anything of that nature are required.

Notwithstanding their great simplicity McCall Patterns are absolutely correct in style. They faithfully represent the very latest American and foreign fashions, and are produced by a staff of designers having no superior for originality and high artistic tastes and ideals.

To wear garments fashioned from McCall Patterns is to be absolutely sure that you have the latest word in style.

The price is within the reach of everybody—10 and 15 cents—none higher.

They will save you not only money, time and bother, but materials as well.

They are carefully designed with a view to saving materials instead of wasting them.

McCall's Magazine
READ IN A MILLION HOMES

McCall's Magazine is a recognized authority on fashions. Every number contains about sixty new styles in women's garments of all kinds. It is an absolute necessity to the woman who wishes to be well and correctly dressed.

More than this, it is a magazine of a highly interesting and entertaining nature. It contains departments on home topics, special articles on the care of the skin, complexion and hair, health and beauty hints, and a large amount of general reading matter and fiction as well.

The price is only 50 cents a year. Use the coupon and send in your subscription now. You will get twelve numbers of a splendid magazine, and in addition we will make you a present of the pattern illustrated in this advertisement—or any other pattern which you may choose from the first number of the magazine which reaches you.

HABIT'S CHAIN

Certain Habits Unconsciously Formed and Hard to Break.

An ingenious philosopher estimates that the amount of will power necessary to break a life-long habit would, if it could be transformed, lift a weigh of many tons.

It sometimes requires a higher degree of heroism to break the chains of a pernicious habit than to lead a forlorn hope in a bloody battle. A lady writes from an Indiana town:

"From my earliest childhood I was a lover of coffee. Before I was out of my teens I was a miserable dyspeptic, suffering terribly at times with my stomach.

"I was convinced that it was coffee that was causing the trouble and yet I could not deny myself a cup for breakfast. At the age of 36 I was in very poor health, indeed. My sister told me I was in danger of becoming a coffee drunkard.

"But I never could give up drinking coffee for breakfast although it kept me constantly ill, until I tried Postum. I learned to make it properly according to directions, and now we can hardly do without Postum for breakfast, and care nothing at all for coffee.

"I am no longer troubled with dyspepsia, do not have spells of suffering with my stomach that used to trouble me so when I drank coffee."

Look in pkgs. for the little book, "The Road to Wellville." "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

Reader. I notice that the Spanish War Veterans want the bodies removed from the wreck of the Maine and buried in Arlington, and that the George A. Millar Camp of Michigan has recently passed resolutions earnestly and emphatically declaring themselves in favor of immediate legislation by the national Congress which shall provide that the wreck of the Maine be removed from Havana harbor and that the remains which may be found therein shall be buried with honors in the National Cemetery at Arlington. Will you kindly give us the benefit of your opinion as to the advisability of raising the wrecked battleship at this late date?

As recently published in our columns, we have referred a former inquiry of similar purport to Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee, U. S. N., retired, who at the time of the Maine disaster was her commandant. Admiral Sigsbee then promised to prepare for us, in time for the next anniversary of the blowing up of the vessel, his views concerning the raising of the Maine, and we are arranging for the publication of the article in our issue of February 16 (our Washington's Birthday number). We ask our correspondent to excuse us from anticipating, with our own opinions, the publication of Admiral Sigsbee's views.

A. L., Leland, Ill. Is merchandise, such as a knife, subject to a duty if sent to a friend in a foreign country by mail? What will become of it if duty is not paid, providing there is a duty?

You cannot tell on this side what the duty may be, consequently it is usually paid by the receiver, and you can transmit the amount to him. Some countries have a duty on knives, others do not. An article subject to duty has to pay that duty when it is sent through the mails just the same as if it were carried in. If the duty is not paid, it is placed in storage for a time, and then confiscated and sold at auction. In sending articles abroad it is best to send them through some express company, and place with them enough money to cover all charges. They will refund any surplus.

B. A., Bovill, Idaho. We do not agree with you that the church is to be found always on the side of capital. There are many able, fearless, consecrated ministers who are not afraid to deal with the whole economic question from the correct Gospel standpoint, and we believe their number is increasing. The church is getting more and more in touch with the spirit and message of its Founder. It is easy to declaim against the pulpit, and we know that detraction of this sort is popular with a certain class of extremists; but it is neither just nor sensible. The leaders in the church to-day are those that speak the clearest Gospel note on vital questions, and not the men who stand on ancient privilege, arraying themselves on the side of wealth and power and showing cold indifference to the condition of the working class.

C. E. S., New York. What proportion of American, Irish, German and Scotch, compared with the rest of the nationalities, fought in our Revolution under Washington?

The great majority of those forming the patriot army were of English descent; then come those of Scotch and Dutch descent. There were some Irish, and a few Germans. The great Irish immigration to America did not start until 1840, and the German immigration about 1848.

Mrs. B. H. R., Cherryville, N. C. Please tell me what "children," and of what "kingdom," should be cast into outer darkness, in Matt. 8:12.

See Matt. 13:42, also Matt. 21:43, which explain the earlier passage. It refers to those who were nominally in the kingdom (of the Son of Man) who never really belonged there, but usurped place and privilege. They were "children of the kingdom" in name only. Jesus had been speaking of the wonderful faith of the centurion, a heathen, and contrasting it with the lack of faith among those who were originally chosen to participate in his kingdom (see verses 10 and 11).

A. S., G. H., Frank, Pa. Can a judgment note be collected after it is due, nothing having been paid on it for ten years?

If ten years have passed since the note became due, during which time no payment has been made on it, probably no collection can be made. Sometimes, however, special circumstances prevent the statute of limitations from winning. Better see a Pennsylvania lawyer.

J. B. S., Sharon, Conn. Where are the graves of the Presidents from James Garfield to Grover Cleveland?

President Garfield is buried in Cleveland, O. We are not certain where Arthur was buried. President Cleveland is buried in Princeton, N. J.; President Harrison is buried at Indianapolis, Ind., and President McKinley is buried at Canton, O.

N. R. R., Milford, Tex. 1. Could the mine owners have iron tubes in the mines to lower water and food in case of a disaster, also 'phone wire, so the imprisoned miners could talk with those above? 2. Why do some people regard the number 13 unlucky? 3. Have the Indians a "legend" as to how they crossed the ocean to this continent?

1. There are a number of safety devices used, but we do not know of any such as you suggest. The plan seems practicable. 2. The number 13 is regarded as unlucky because there were thirteen people at the "last supper," our Lord and the twelve disciples. 3. The Eastern Indians had a number of legends indicating their belief that they came from east of the "great salt water." Any book on Indian legends will probably contain these.

J. B., Stockholm, S. Dak. Could you tell if chain letters are legal?

There is no law against chain letters, but they are considered a vexation by most people and are seldom tried now.

At this season of the year we are overwhelmed with the number of gracious letters that pour in upon us from many quarters, from appreciative subscribers. Though we cannot publish these, we thank the senders. Occasionally our friends drop into verse, as in this "Tribute" from a subscriber in Oswayo, Pa., Pastor L. H. Moore:

Herald of truth in beautiful form,
Herald of light in darkness and storm,
Herald of love to all who may read,
Herald of mercy to millions in need;
Herald of peace to factions at strife,
Herald of joy to brighten our life,
We welcome THE HERALD for what it doth bring,
And of its great merit in praise we would sing.
Its pages are graceful, well printed and fair,
Adorned with bright pictures, all comely and rare.
May God bless its visits to thousands of homes,
The wide world all over, wherever it comes.

A. H. Fletcher, St. Paul, Minn., writes: "Our church, like a great many others, is financially embarrassed. Some churches have solved the problem, and now have clear sailing. I should like to have them tell us how they solved it. I should like to correspond personally with them."

Any reader of this journal who has any practical suggestion on this subject is invited to write to Mr. Fletcher.

Mrs. K. G. D., Macon, Ill. When, how and by whom was England Christianized?

Tradition ascribes the introduction of Christianity in England to several different agencies, of which the apostle Paul is one. None of these, however, can now be substantiated. There is no positive knowledge of Christianity having been planted in Britain until toward the end of the second century. Tertullian, in 208 A.D., wrote that it had been carried there by unknown missionaries.

J. B. M., Indiana. What basis is there for the statement that the ages of the patriarchs, which we find in the Bible, were not as long as we have understood them to be? One minister here says that Methuselah's age was only seventy years and a few months, instead of 969 years, as the Bible says.

Some of the "higher critics" claim that the ancient calendar of the antediluvians made the year really a month, or lunar period. Others, with somewhat more reason, assert that a year was a season of growth equal to three of our months. Hensler and Hufeland, two German authorities, claim that the patriarchal year was three months till Abraham's time, eight months till Joseph's time, and thereafter twelve months. One eminent Bible scholar has pointed out that if we accept the monthly year theory, Mahalaleel's sixty-five years before the birth of his son Jared would make him a parent at five years and three months of our reckoning; Enoch would be the same age when his son Methuselah was born, and the ages of the other patriarchs at the birth of their children would be equally preposterous. Of course, such conclusions absolutely condemn the monthly year theory. Conditions among the antediluvians were totally different from those after the Flood. There had been no rain, and the sun and planets were not visible; in the moist atmosphere, growth was greatly stimulated and all natural conditions tended to animal and vegetable longevity, precisely as the Bible indicates. Besides, as that period produced animal types of giant proportions, created for strength and endurance, the analogy of nature would seem to demand that man should bear some harmonious proportion to his surroundings. Gen. 6:4 (first clause) clearly implies this. Age and stature, not only human but otherwise, became greatly diminished after the Flood.

H. B., Ephrata, Pa. 1. How many people are fed at the Bowery Mission daily? 2. Grammatically speaking, in what gender is sun? 3. Please name some books that you would advise a young person to read that are uplifting and helpful in after life.

1. Two thousand to 2,500 are fed in the "Bread Line." Then there are meals furnished to helpers and others who are being cared for while the Labor Bureau is trying to secure places for them. 2. Sun is masculine. 3. Lists of best books for young men have been prepared by many people, and are as various as the tastes of the compilers. If you get some good book on English literature, such as Shaw's English Literature, it will give you an idea of the works of the best English and American authors, and you can judge what hooks would be best suited to your tastes. You should read Scott, Dickens and Thackeray, of the English writers, and Hawthorne, Lowell, Longfellow, of the American standards. After these, if one loves books, it will not be hard to tell elevating literature from that which is trivial and of doubtful value. Get the advice of the head of the department of English Literature in one of your State universities.

R. G., Herkimer, N. Y. 1. Can you tell me something about the Modoc Indians? 2. What was the massacre with which their name was connected a few years ago?

The Modocs belonged originally to the Klamath tribe, which lived in northern California. In 1864 the Modocs gave up their land to the United States Government, and in 1871 moved to the Klamath reservation. As they did not find things tq their liking on the reservation, part of them returned to their old lands and defeated troops sent to expel them. 2. On April 11, 1873, General Canby and Commissioner Thomas went on a peaceful mission to arrange a settlement. They were massacred by the Modocs. Troops were sent against them, and, after several days' desperate fighting, the Indians were all killed or captured. Some were executed, and the rest sent to the Indian Territory.

M. L. D., Goff, Kan. Are not the majority of the people in Christian nations anxious that murderous wars be forever discontinued?

The world is still very far removed from the time when war can be abolished. God's people everywhere should work and pray for peace, and should never fail to use their influence to that end; but wars will no doubt continue until the end of the age, although doubtless in a diminishing scale. This is the Scriptural teaching on the subject. We are not to expect universal peace until the millennium.

A. A., Aldrich, Minn. Is the world getting better or worse?

This question has often been discussed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. No one with a knowledge of history can doubt that we have more opportunities for the lowly man than ever before, that the world is less cruel and that the public conscience is becoming keener. There is vast room for improvement in morals, but as we compare the centuries we see that we are advancing here. We hear about the crimes of the whole world in the papers and get a mistaken idea that things are worse. We used to be in ignorance of the outside world, and so long for "the good old times"; in most cases they were the bad old times.

A. P. P., Union, Wash. Where can I obtain books which treat of the authenticity of the Bible as the Word of God?

The best volumes on the subject are Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, by F. C. Kenyon, and The Ancestry of the Bible, by I. M. Price. You can procure these through any good bookseller.

Jessie D., Roxbury, Mass. A Christian Science friend claims that the denomination now numbers over 1,000,000 members in this country. Are there any reliable means of knowing its present strength?

The Religious Census, issued this year, brings up the figures to 1906, at which time there were 604 organizations, with 85,717 members, 72.4 per cent. being females, the largest proportion Reader, Arapahoe, Neb. Does the Bible teach sanctification as a second definite work, or as a growth?

When a person, believing in Christ, unreservedly gives himself to God he is then enabled to "believe unto righteousness," and God, by communicating his Holy Spirit, sanctifies him. (See Ezek. 36:25-29; I. Cor. 3:16, 17, 19; II. Cor. 6:16-18; Eph. 2:22.) This may be the act of an instant. "Entire sanctification" is another question. There are many different opinions as to the degree of deliverance from sin which the believer may expect in this life.

A reader, E. W. R., of Purcell, Okla., sends the following suggestion for saving life in mine disasters: "Would it not be possible for mine owners to keep supplies of food stored in different places in the mines, to be used by the imprisoned miners in times of accident? Many times much suffering could have been prevented and many lives saved if only the poor unfortunate men had had something to eat while waiting for days, and even weeks, for the rescuers to reach them."

H. R., Paterson, N. J. The meeting of Jews and Gentiles of various denominations, on the same platform, to give thanks for the blessings of the year, is a beautiful indication of the growth of religious tolerance and human brotherhood. Without surrender of creeds or principles, they meet on common ground as children of one Father. It is not Christianity, since Jesus is not proclaimed at the gathering, but it is a step toward Christianity, since it brings men of different creeds into closer fraternal relationship.

A Poor Widow's Thanks

My Dear Dr. Klopsch: May I quote a letter received from a recipient of one of your Thanksgiving baskets—a little crippled widow—who has three children, a boy in school and two little girls? She writes:

"My children and myself have been so thankful ever since Thanksgiving Day, because we have not had a dinner like that for a long time. We cannot forget it." Gratitude is so welcome that I wanted you to know that we and they are grateful to Dr. Klopsch.

HARRIET IRWIN.

THE STAR AT CHRIST'S BIRTH

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IT was with a full knowledge of the prophecies that the wise men who had seen "His star in the east" came to Palestine with their question, "Where is He that is born King of the the Jews? for we have seen his star in the East, and we are come to worship him." No doubt, no supposition; these men were sure of their affair. They did not say, "Is there one born King of the Jews?" No, it was, "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" God had made known to them that he was born, and they said, "We are come to worship him." But "when King Herod heard these things he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him." Herod was no son of the house of David; he was not born King of the Jews, but made so by the conquering power of Rome; but here was One for whom it was claimed that he was born King ("Unto us a Child is born," Isa. 9:6), that he was the rightful Heir to the throne of his father David (Luke 1:32). Was this a message from God, and would Herod bow before God?

Would the chief priests and elders search the Scriptures and examine the genealogy of him who was born King? Would the Scribes, the logicians of the day, find out whether his claims were divine? No; Herod "was troubled," not rejoiced, "and all Jerusalem with him." Jerusalem, through her elders, priests and Scribes, was contented that things should go on as they were; the Scriptures were a dead letter to them; their hearts were not longing for the coming of the Messiah. Just as in these days, the political, and the larger part of the ecclesiastical, leaders ignore the second coming of our Lord, which must be so near. Herod gathered the chief priests and Scribes of the people together, and demanded of them where the Christ should be born, and they quickly found the passage in the prophet Micah (5:2): "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me, that is to be Ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting."

Here was the Scripture which these leaders of the people professed to be guided by; here was the announcement by men who had had a revelation from heaven, that He of whom the prophets spake was born, and yet not one of them took the trouble to accompany the wise men to Bethlehem to see and welcome and worship the divine and newborn King!

But, however indifferent Jerusalem was with her foreign king and her unbelieving and indifferent priests and elders and Scribes, these Gentile seekers would not be put off from the object of their journey. On leaving King Herod, the welcome sight of the star which had guided them to Jerusalem returned, and the chilling indifference of the people who ought to have been the first to welcome their King did not hinder them from following the star to Bethlehem—for none from Jerusalem offered to escort them—until it stood over the house where the young Child was. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy; to them it meant communion with God, and kept them in touch with him.

They Adore It

My Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your Hero Tales from American Life came last night. We are simply delighted with the book; in fact, we adore it. How you can furnish it at so slight a cost is a marvel. We cannot understand it, but no doubt you can. You always do things that seem impossible.

HER BLIND EYES OPENED

THE interesting case of Lottie Sheldon, the blind girl of Ann Arbor, Mich., whose eyesight was restored almost miraculously, has attracted much attention, and we are glad to be able to give from her own hand an authentic description of her case.

It has been said that her blindness was pronounced hopeless by many physicians, and that her sight was at last given back by a miracle, in answer to prayer.

Undoubtedly her fervent prayers contributed in no small measure to the restoration of her sight; but in answering them Providence used, as generally in these days, the instrument of human service.

Miss Lottie Sheldon

Miss Sheldon, then almost totally blind, was taken to the Homœopathic Hospital at Ann Arbor, Mich., by her brother and a friend. After a thorough examination of her eyes, the physician told her that they were simply veiled by cataracts, which could undoubtedly be removed. This was done successfully a few days later.

Miss Sheldon's account of the dropping of the cocaine upon her eyes; of the patience required to endure the long bandaging and nursing; and of her joy when the surgeon's pad was removed from her face and she saw again is most touching. She is enthusiastic over the kindness and skill of the doctors and nurses, and is now working hard in order to earn money to give sight to a brother, who is afflicted as she was.

For two weeks after her recovery she worked in the kitchen of the hospital, in order to discharge her debt for the operation. She cannot say enough of the kindness of all those who worked there with her.

Modern science is indeed almost miraculous; and it was through the application of its laws, and not through their suspension, that this woman was enabled to say, with the sightless of old, "I was blind, now I see." Her gratitude to God for restored sight is most fervent.

FRIENDLY WORDS FROM SUBSCRIBERS

Mothers, Read This

My Dear Mr. Klopsch: I have just looked over Before the Doctor Comes, and it has brought tears to my eyes and palpitation to my heart. This does not read like a testimonial, but it means more than I can tell you. My comfort, however, is that, in the future should there be occasion, my remaining children will get the benefit. May God bless and reward you for placing such a helpful book within the reach of your readers. May every mother add it to her treasures. J. W. C.

Yonkers, N. Y.

She Loves to Join in Deeds of Mercy

Dear Dr. Klopsch: My sister and myself have enjoyed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD greatly the past year. I think it the finest Christian magazine I have ever read, and I pray the blessing of our heavenly Father upon you for the acts of charity and love and mercy you have showered, yes, literally showered, upon the poor and suffering of this earth. Surely the Master will say unto you on the Judgment Day, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me," and that will be better than all the praise that earth can give. Blessed is the one to whom this will be spoken in the last day, the great day of the Lord.

San José, Calif. MARY E. SCATES.

A Series of Surprises

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received the Red Letter Bible all right, and was more than pleased with it and was very much surprised to find it followed up with your famous "Dreamland" calendar. I was still more surprised to see also with it the picture of the "Daughters of Dorcas." I am so proud of them both that words cannot express how glad I am, and I intend to have both of them put in frames and hung up in my room. I did not expect so much when I renewed my subscription for another year, and again I thank you. I ask God's blessing upon the good you are doing throughout the world.

To Oppose Infidelity

AN educational and religious movement of national scope and importance has been inaugurated by the Bible League of North America, of which William Phillips Hall, of New York City, is president, and Henry Otis Dwight, D.D., LL.D., vice-president, and of which a score and more of the church leaders, clerical and lay, of national or international reputation, representing the various evangelical denominations, are directors and officers. The object is to furnish an agency that shall completely counteract the widespread teaching of infidelity in many leading American colleges, and in divinity schools, which are spreading agnosticism, pantheism and materialism.

The Bible League has issued a call for a general enrolment of "all who love the old Gospel and hold the Bible as God's inspired Word," for the purpose of an aggressive educational campaign. It is proposed to raise a fund of $100,000 yearly, to be expended in introducing sound Bible teaching in schools and colleges; to issue literature for the instruction of the people in the Bible and Christianity in Sunday Schools and Bible Schools; to prepare a great Bible dictionary on strictly evangelical lines, and to establish an educational centre from which to direct the work generally. The campaign will be carried on through the medium of the League's able publication, The Bible Student and Teacher, of which the Rev. Daniel S. Gregory, D.D., LL.D., is editor. The headquarters of the League are at 86 Bible House, New York City, where all requests for further information as to the new campaign may be addressed.

The Coming of the Redeemer*

IN the present tumultuous and universal observation of Christmas Day, when even the Jew is beginning to be affected by the Christmas spirit, and also men who never at any other time name the name of Christ nor think of him, the deep meaning of the festival has been largely lost sight of.

For to one who ponders the matter, and who studies with awe the mysterious ways in which Providence attains its beneficent ends, a profounder significance lurks behind Christmas keeping than men are wont to give it.

Christ was born in Bethlehem two thousand years ago. Each year we celebrate his birthday. He once told a great "master in Israel" that he could not see the kingdom of God until he had been "born again." This symbol of a new birth, a making-over of each man for once and all, may well be extended in our minds to a yearly new birth. Each Christmas we should let Christ be born anew in our hearts, and thus our whole natures shall be transformed afresh into his image.

For in the wear and tear of our earthly life, in the incessant moil and wrestle which fall to the lot of most of us, we are all too apt to become separated from our Saviour. We say that we have not "time" to think of him. Insensibly we forget to model every thought and act upon the pattern which he has set us.

But Christmas dawns. For weeks we have been thinking of making others happy by our gifts—cultivating the blessed altruism which our Saviour taught us. Now we are brought face to face once more with the transcendent fact of his first appearance in the world. He was born man, yet God; "in all things as we ourselves are, yet without sin."

His appeal now comes loudly to us, who are weighted with the mud and slime of earth until our likeness to him is almost lost. He seems to say, as he has said every year before, "Let me be born in your soul anew. I will strip off this mildewed blight of worldliness. You shall be a new man, and I will fold you afresh in the mantle of my Godhood and furnish you with new helps for the year to come."

Yes, it is at Christmas, far more than on New Year's Day, that the Christian may wisely plume his wings anew for the flight ahead of him.

You are bidden in your "notes" to read the wonderful Christmas Carol of Charles Dickens.

Is it not remarkable that, though the literary critics have pooh-poohed at this story, have called it "cheap fustian" and a mass of "silly sentimentality"; have condemned it as false in its tone and "unscientific" in its philanthropy, it still retains and must ever retain its hold upon the human heart. No great literary composition has ever escaped the condemnation of these short-sighted literary critics. Volumes could be written upon the monumental mistakes which they have made in attempting to measure the permanent value of contemporary works.

Read that beautiful story. It contains the spirit of Christ and Christmas, as do few other compositions in our language. Read also the wonderful story in Matthew's second chapter, and as you read, if you hold your soul open to its sacred influences, lo! Christ shall be born again in your soul, and with his presence shall come strength and peace.

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, December 26 TEXTS: Matt. 2:1, 2; Num. 24:17; Jer. 23:5; Isa. 59:19, 20.

Missionary Responsibility*

THE personal gifts which we make at the Christmas season are, no matter how innocently unselfish we may be in the making, merely a kind of barter. We give a present, and the donor makes one also to us.

The true Christmas gift is given, "hoping for nothing again." It is given from the highest motive—the love to our Maker, and the desire to extend his kingdom. It is given to the poor and benighted, and the truest of all is that given to those far away, whose regeneration means nothing to us; broadly speaking, it is a gift to God, without alloy of selfishness.

Such a gift is one for missions. If you may not go in person to the needy, in obedience to the command of Jesus, your money may go in your place and thus you virtually keep his word.

Those who read recently of the munificent benefactions of the late John S. Kennedy must have thought, "How delightful to be able to dispense such help and pleasure—what joy to make so many happy!"

But each one of us, no matter how limited our means, may give as much, in proportion, to good causes. Not a week passes but that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD searches out and indicates to you the causes which are most worthy, both at home and abroad; and even the smallest donation helps.

It is notable that many, probably most, of our rich men began life in poverty, and little by little painfully amassed the beginnings of their fortunes. It is also notable that very many of them have been ardent art collectors and patrons of learning—a happy combination for us of these United States.

One lesson that we may learn from their lives is the importance of saving money. We spend too much upon selfishness and folly—too much for our food, too much for fine clothing and amusements. By thrift and care we, too, may amass enough to give away more freely.

Another lesson is that we, too, should love most of all religion and knowledge; as not only history and common sense, but the Good Book, bids us. The Proverbs of Solomon are full of passionate injunctions to cultivate not only the fear of the Lord, but knowledge and wisdom, which are "better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold."

"Wherever he has gone," says Alexander Powell, "the modern missionary has stood for progress and civilization. He has marched in the very van of history—Livingstone, giving England a new empire in the heart of Africa; Verbeck, opening Japan to Western civilization; Alexander Duc, promoting an educational system for India; Cyrus Hamlin, founding a college that was to count mightily in the solution of the great 'Eastern question'; and the great host of others who gradually raise the physical, social and moral standards of a whole country. These courageous, self-sacrificing men and women have played a great part in the history of this world. But all too often is their progress traced by trails of blood; all too often are their names found on the roll of martyrs."

The poet has put into the lips of Scipio Africanus the words:

> Life here is loaned us for a little while,
> That we may bless with it our fellow-men.

There is no season when this great use of life is more impressed upon us than at the Christmastide; and we can bless our fellow-men most nobly, perhaps, when we give of our prayers and our substance to missions.

6% Irrigation Bonds

Secured by a Thousand Farms

The security back of Irrigation bonds is first liens on farm lands—sometimes a thousand farms.

These liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. They are paid in annual installments. The land which secures them is generally worth four times the lien.

The trustee may hold a thousand such liens—given by a thousand farmers on a thousand separate farms—as security for the bonds as a whole.

The farms under lien are among the most fertile farms in America. And the perpetual water right, which the lien secures, multiplies the land's value. The first crop is usually more than sufficient to pay the whole lien.

The land is not subject to crop failures, because the farmer controls his water supply. The earnings are large and sure.

A bond issue based on a thousand such liens is, in our estimation, the safest sort of security.

Additional Security

Irrigation bonds are additionally secured by a first mortgage on all the property owned by the Irrigation Company. The investment in this property is often twice the bond issue.

Thus, in addition to the many farm liens, we have this corporation and all of its property pledged to the fulfillment of all obligations.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued, like School bonds, by organized districts. Such bonds form a tax lien on all the taxable property of the community.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued under the "Carey Act," where the State supervises the project.

73 Issues Sold

During the past 15 years we have sold 73 separate issues of Drainage and Irrigation bonds, all secured by farm liens. Every obligation under every bond has been promptly met.

These bonds have become, with most of our customers, the most popular bonds that we handle. Now, we have first pick of these projects, because of our dominant place in this field.

Our own engineers and attorneys investigate every feature. An officer of our Company constantly resides in the irrigated sections, watching the projects we finance. Thus, our customers secure only the very cream of Irrigation bonds.

Ideal Investments

Such Irrigation bonds as we handle are regarded as ideal investments. The security approaches the absolute.

They are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years, so one may obtain any desired maturity. The denominations are $100, $500 and $1,000, so one may invest either little or much.

The demand for irrigated land is so great, and the projects so profitable, that the bonds pay six per cent. That is a higher rate than can now be obtained on any large class of equal securities.

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, based on our vast experience. Every investor, small or large, should read it. The book is free. Cut out this coupon, as a reminder to write for it.

January Investments

For January investors we have on hand 100 varieties of bonds. They include Municipal, Public Utility, Water Power, Corporation and Irrigation Bonds. Please ask for our list. Cut out this reminder so you won't forget.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

"And what of Corisande?"

"Unless it is myself, no one yet knows her mouth's secret. But I think I understand both her mouth and her temper. I have always been on the side of victory. I do not intend to be beat."

"So! That is good. But you will find the racecourse and the battlefield different. I am not against a good race fairly run and fairly won, but God save us from the battlefield."

"Indeed, Captain, at the meeting last night you were plainly for the battlefield."

"I, Joris, for the battlefield?"

"Yes, sir, and you spoke of it with a great heart; for when De Lancey said, 'such sentiments as John Cruger and William Bayard advocated would bring on rebellion and civil war,' you answered, 'De Lancey, we expect nothing but war; but if war, victory.' Upon the honor of a soldier, sir, I would then have followed you to any battlefield."

The Captain looked confused, and Madame, rubbing the end of her nose with an air of scorn, leaned forward and shook a forefinger impressively at him. "I told thee, Jan, to keep quiet," she said, "and it seems thy 'few words' were for war. I am ashamed of thee."

"Indeed, Madame," cried Joris, "you would have been exceedingly proud if you had heard Captain Van Vroom speak. It was only a few words each time, but they were such words as made men think great thoughts, and feel their manhood. In this way it came about," he continued; "we were sitting at the long tables of the Exchange Hall, and the floor space between them was crowded with standing men. De Lancey rose to answer some statement made by Mr. Low, and he said 'the Stamp Act imposed by the House of Commons was a just tax, and it did not ask us to contribute a penny to the navy that protected our coasts, nor yet a penny to the interest of the English debt. Whatever money is collected in America was to be spent in America, spent in paying one-third of the expense necessary to support an army for our own defense. Was this tyranny, was this injustice?' he asked. 'On the contrary,' he declared, 'England had been too indulgent, too forbearing with our unreasonable demands and complaints; we were froward, disobedient children, who deserve from the administration vigorous, yes, even rigorous, measures.'"

"Well, then, Joris, tell us what Rutgers said to this reproof," and the Captain evidently recalled Mr. Rutgers' interruption with delight.

Joris also laughed as he imitated the passionate amendment of the vituperative Rutgers, slowly spitting out the words, with the same black frown and scornful hatred:

"'Why stop at vigorous, or even rigorous, measures?' he asked. 'Why not advise les dragonnades, and then the shameful tax could be collected by the soldiers the administration has forced into our homes!'

"De Lancey was scornfully silent, and Mr. Low said, 'The Commons in America had, and always had had, the constitutional right to grant their own money, otherwise we should be slaves; in short——' and then there was great confusion, and many speaking at once, until up rose our Captain, and his voice was like the voice of a man used to commanding the winds and the waves. Every one was still in a moment and through the hall and through every heart in it rang the Captain's words—'De Lancey, the English House of Commons does not represent us, therefore it can not lawfully tax us; and illegal taxes we will not pay—no, not a copper farthing of them!'

"Good, my fader," said Arent. "Go on, Joris."

"'It is dog-mean for the colonists to grudge payment for their own protection, dog-mean!' answered De Lancey. 'Great Britain protects America, and America is honorably bound to be obedient to Great Britain.'

"'We don't need Great Britain to protect us,' was the quick answer. 'We have three hundred thousand white men in our colonies between the ages of sixteen and sixty. During the recent war we supported twenty-five thousand soldiers for England, and spent many millions of money. Heavy taxes among ourselves we have paid, both for military and civil establishments. Nothing at all for forts, garrisons, or armies to keep us in subjection have we cost England. By a little ink and paper we have been ruled. Why, then, are English soldiers billeted in our homes? We don't need them. Our militia is sufficient. The fight is within every man of us. To coerce, not to defend us, they sit at our firesides. Let them try it!'

"'Do we owe England nothing, then? Are we to have all the favors we receive from her without payment? The idea is indecent and dishonest, Van Vroom!'

"'We do pay, De Lancey, and pay well. The profits of England from the colonies is no less than two millions of pounds a year.'

"'Then, sir, in the name of common sense what is all your grumbling for?' retorted De Lancey. 'The Stamp Duty is worth only one hundred thousand pounds annually. England is losing a million pounds a year by it.'

"Then," said Joris, "you should have seen our Captain's face. It burned and glowed with anger, and he struck the table a blow with his hand as he answered: 'De Lancey, you are thinking of pounds and profits; the men who are against the Stamp Act are thinking of Liberty, and Honor, and Justice, and Self-Respect! How many millions of pounds are they worth to the City of New York and her burghers? It is not the gold! No, it is not the gold. That we have not counted. It is the principle.'

"'The principle!' sneered De Lancey. 'That is a new motive, most unexpected. Do you know what it means, Van Vroom?'

"'In this case, De Lancey, it means no robbery. We will not suffer that men in England vote our money away from us without our consent or knowledge. If to rob a citizen is a crime, a far greater crime it is to rob a nation. If England will commit that crime, what next?'

"'Then, after all, your principle means money. I thought so!' and De Lancey spoke with a laughing contempt, and sat down.

"'It means,' cried our Captain, 'that no one can tax us lawfully except ourselves, or our representatives. At the root of all national freedom lies this law. If out of our right England takes it, she may as well take all the rest with it. With tooth and nail, through thick and thin, through life and death, for this principle I will stand!' And most of the men sitting rose to their feet with a shout, and Joris Artaveldt rose with them."

So with flashing eyes and arms flung outward Joris spoke, and his passion of patriotism touched those listening with the same spirit. Madame leaned forward and took her husband's hand.

Peter Moller's Cod Liver Oil should be purchased for the following good reasons:

It is a pure oil, so pure that it is positively free from disagreeable taste and odor. Children take it without persuasion. It digests readily, does not cling to the palate, and never "repeats."

It is made and bottled by Peter Moller at his own factory at the Norway fisheries—no adulteration possible.

Not sold in bulk. You know you get the genuine when you receive the flat oval bottle bearing the name of —MISSIONARY A. H. LEO, of the M. E. Church Mission, Ponce, Porto Rico, sends a strong appeal for support for a qualified medical worker among the mountain people on that island. One thousand dollars will cover the cost.

Laborers in the Vineyard

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., have just closed a great revival meeting in Calumet, Mich. They are now engaged in a union evangelistic campaign with all the churches of the West Side of Bay City, Mich. The meetings open with great crowds and deep interest.

—DR. WILFRED T. GRENFELL, the famous medical missionary of Labrador, was married recently to Miss Annie E. McClanahan, a young Chicago lady, daughter of one of the leading families of that city. They will make their home at St. Anthony, N. F.

—PRESIDENT SCARBOROUGH, of Wilberforce University, Wilberforce, O., is making a supreme effort to raise a fund of $17,500, to cover the promised gift of a similar sum by Mr. Carnegie. Of this amount $6,000 has already been received. The purpose in view is to erect a new normal and industrial school at Wilberforce.

—DR. D. K. PEARSONS, the distinguished Western philanthropist, is not above mixing humor with his pathos occasionally. Lately he gave $50,000 to Montpelier Seminary, Vermont, and in his letter of donation he addressed his gift thus: "Now, fifty thousand dollars, farewell! Go into the keeping of younger men, and God's blessing go with you. Do your duty, and give the poor boys and girls of Vermont a fair chance."

—COMMANDER MAUD BALLINGTON BOOTH, of the Volunteers of America, is planning her usual Christmas charity. She writes: "Our plan is to pack a big box for each family, in which we send new clothing for every child, warm garments for the mother, groceries and toys. The needs of each family having been thoroughly investigated beforehand, we can do this in the most practical way, so that every gift is just what is needed. These boxes are delivered personally to all those living in New York the day before Christmas." She may be addressed at No. 34 West Twenty-eighth Street, New York.

"Thy words were great words, Jan," she said, "and I am glad that thou had thy say." And Jan laughed and patted his wife's cheek, and Katrina never once raised her eyes to the clock, though it was striking four. During this little interlude, Joris also was receiving compensations. Virginia's beaming glance of approval, Rose's evident admiration, Arent's enthusiasm, Madame's smile, were all sweet and welcome; and with increased spirit he continued his narration.

"After the Captain's speech Judge Jones arose. He told us we were all at sixes and sevens in this matter, and knew nothing of what we were talking about. But, he said, without inquiry as to the right or wrong of it, we had better remember that what England wills, she wills; and that we must either bend or break to that will.

"For a moment there was a dead silence; then, from the crowd on the floor, Tobit Levi stepped forth. His old eyes shone like fire, and he stroked his long white beard, and looked like the seer his people say he is. His voice was low, but clear and deliberate, and it went through the crowd like the voice of the wind; all alike heard and felt its whispering power, and the words they heard were these:

" 'Nevertheless, we will carry our will through England's teeth, great as she is. I have seen it. This thing I know!' He disappeared among the crowd as soon as he had spoken, and for a few moments a solemn feeling stilled the meeting.

"Mr. Low then called on the merchants who were willing to resist the Stamp Tax to extremities, to sign their names; and De Lancey rose and advised all true and loyal men to depart—'it is an overt act of treason and rebellion,' he said, 'and we will not witness it.' So, accompanied by Elder Semple, Judge Jones, my father, and about a dozen others, they left the hall. At the open door the Elder turned and said angrily:

" 'Sign awa', neighbors, sign awa' your loyalty, and your property, and your lives. You'll save a threepenny stamp ye ken, and you'll be like to have a threepenny war on your hands that will be mair than you can manage. I scorn such a dirty lot o' rebels!'

" 'Keep your tongue, Semple,' growled Rutgers, turning a black, scowling face on the Scotchman. 'You may be loyal now to the German Geordies, but you were a rebel officer at Culloden.' "

This incident seemed virtually to have closed the meeting, but conversation on the subject was too interesting to be dropped at once. It turned to the race at the Artaveldt course, to the lottery, to the proposal for a new theatre, but like the stray shots after a fight, there was a constant return to the Stamp Act. Then the clock struck five, and Madame put down her knitting, and Joris said he must go home. Arent went to the stable with him to get his horse. Captain Jansen followed them, and over Virginia and Rose there fell a spell of silence. It was broken by a surprise; a servant entered with a letter for Lady Rose Harley, and with a feeling of mingled expectation and annoyance, she opened it.

"It is not a love letter, Virginia," she said; "it is something more interesting and unusual. My box of new fineries has arrived, and Mrs. Colden has sent the carriage for me. Alas! I shall have to leave both my idolatries. I wonder if the taffetas and lace will make me as happy."

"But you will not go to-night, Rose?"

"At once, it seems. They are at the fort, both the Coldens and the fineries. In an hour I shall know what the new customs and the writs of assistance have left me."

"But the race on Monday?"

"I shall see you before Monday. I must now hasten, for Mrs. Colden says they will wait tea for me."

However, she contrived to linger long enough to bewilder Arent with her hurry of regrets, her bright smiles, the dewy look of tears in her fine eyes, and the soft clasp of her hand.

"Sweet Virginia, think of me constantly," she whispered. "I shall be inconsolable till I come here again," and she gave Arent, in one kind, sorrowful glance, a portion of such consolation as the assurance afforded.

Poor Arent! The parting was too sudden, too unexpected to be borne. "I have already lost my heart, I shall now lose my senses," he said, for in his reckless misery he forgot to choose his words.

"Indeed, sir," answered Rose, "you must be reasonable. There is always a middle way to be followed."

Then the carriage door was closed, the last words said, the last look exchanged, and Arent felt as if life had suddenly grown dark. All the ancient ecstasies of love and youth, and their special sorrows, overflowed his heart He took Virginia's hand and was speechless. The Stamp Act, with all its wrong and possible calamities, passed out of his mind. He could think only of Rose, of the sit of her head, the curl of her lip, the light of her eyes, the music of her speech, her sweetness so finely mixed with pride. She was not compounded as the other women of virtues and frailties, of loveliness and faults; she was purely perfect, an elemental thing, a vision, a voice out of the unfathomable abyss of life. Poor Arent!

The Best Paper of All

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I wish to acknowledge and thank you for the beautiful picture received for sending in the list of names. It came just in time to make glad the heart of our dear little ten-year-old sick boy and grandson, for whom I desired it as a birthday present. The effort required was a privilege, and I have had the pleasure of sending over a hundred subscribers at different times to you besides this list for the dear and precious CHRISTIAN HERALD. I hope you may long live to send forth its inspiring and instructive pages. I have been a subscriber many years, but am now with my daughter, who is a "life subscriber," through the kindness of a dear cousin. To me it is the best and choicest magazine printed, and I sincerely hope that some, if not all, on this last list will become subscribers. How can they do without it? God bless you abundantly in all your labor of love to uplift and help lost and suffering humanity.

Answered Prayers

Mrs. S. M. E., Uvalde, Tex. "I wish to acknowledge that God has answered many prayers for me."

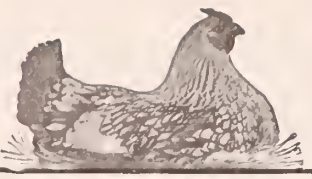
Mrs. M. C., Dewittville, N. Y. "I promised the Lord if he would heal my sister I would acknowledge it publicly."

W. M. A., Mount Hope, Kan. "I was in great trouble. I called to my heavenly Father for relief, and it came to me."

Mrs. L. A. M., Westport. "Last spring I was ill. I promised God if he would restore me to health I would tell the world. He has answered my prayer."

L. G., Little, Ky. "God does answer prayer. Recently I promised I would tell it to the world if he would restore my daughter to health. She is well."

Mrs. F. I. McC., Sheridan, Mont. "I deem it a privilege to witness the promises fulfilled and the prayers answered in God's own time. I have prayed earnestly for the removal of fear through perfect love, and the blessing came."



Just Figure this up:

TWO men, with 1953 hens, in 1908 made $6.41 clear profit on each hen. $6.41 multiplied by 1953 makes—what?

The Corning Egg-Book

(entitled "$6.41 per Hen per Year") tells HOW these men do it, and how they make over $12,000 a year; where they found a market, eager for all they can raise, at high prices; how they keep their hens laying all winter; how they prevent losses, and how they manage all details; and it tells how others, men or women, with good sense and careful work, can make money in the same way.

The Corning Egg-Book is sold in combination with the Greatest Offer in Real Estate History

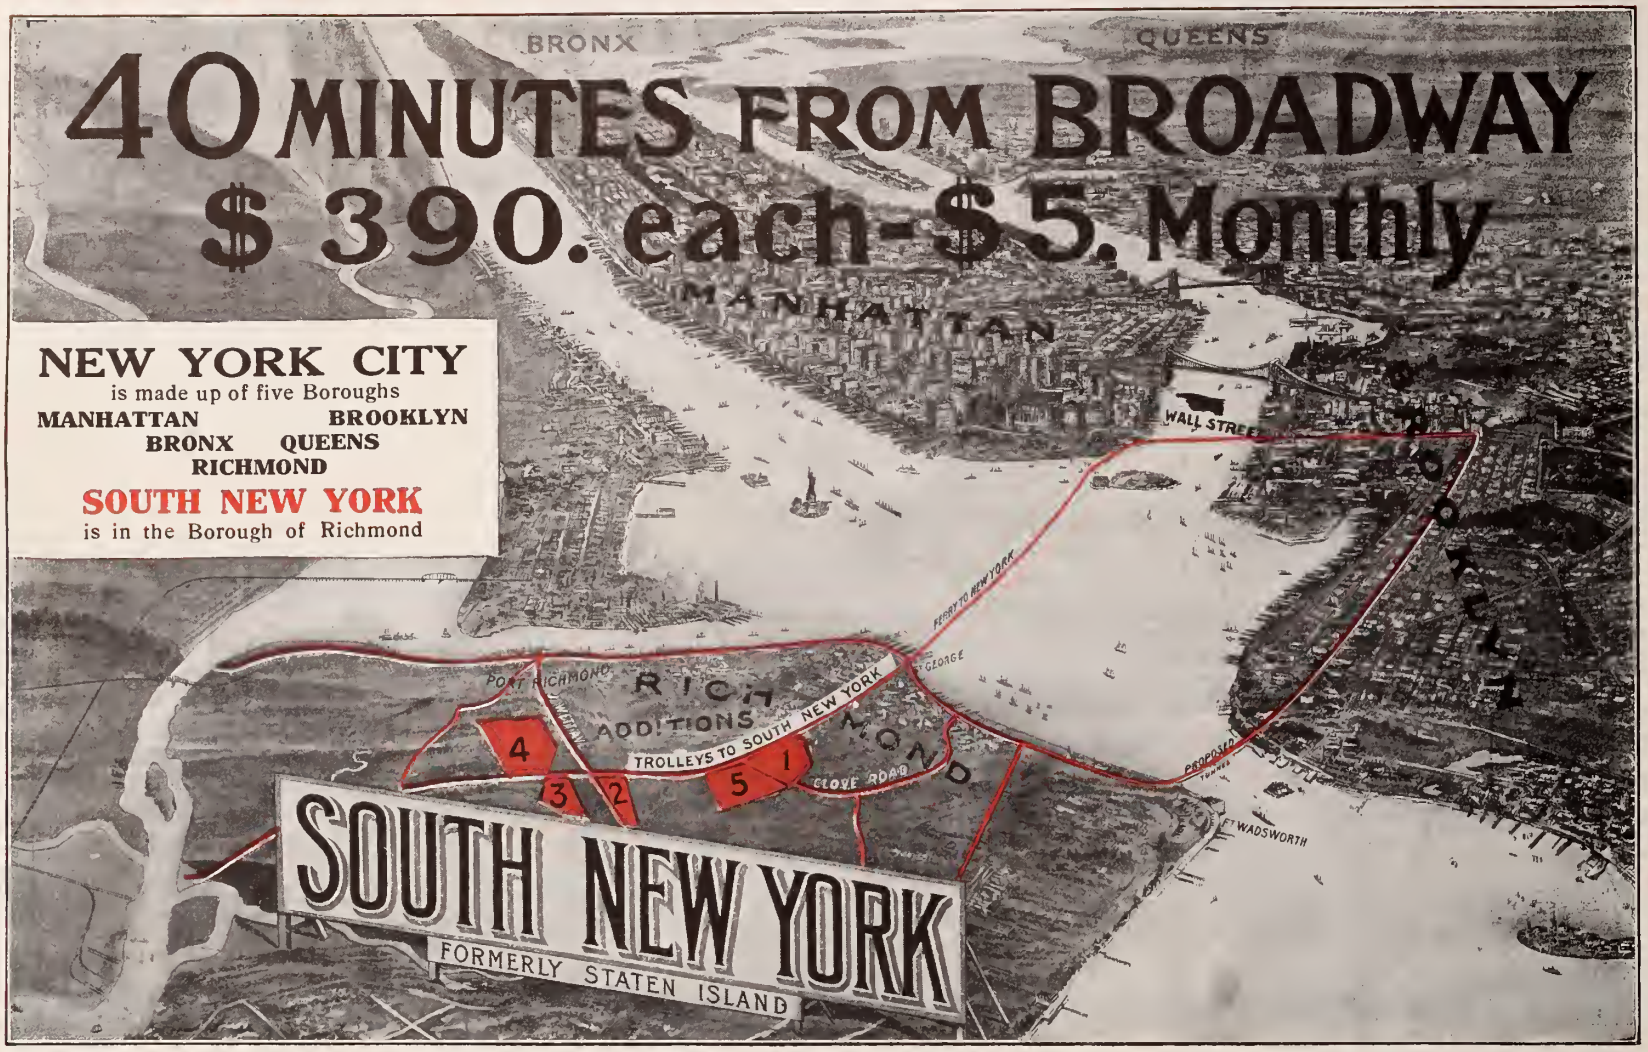
NEW YORK CITY LOTS



NEW YORK REAL ESTATE WILL MAKE MORE MONEY FOR ITS OWNERS than ALL THE GOLD MINES in the WORLD COMBINED

THERE seems to be a sort of magic about the ownership of New York City real estate. In no other city are values so high—nowhere else are they advancing so fast.

New York City real estate increases in value according to the growth of population. Each year we add a city as big as Denver or Toledo; each five years as big as St. Louis or Boston. New York is at the gateway of the continent—Staten Island is at the gateway of New York. No one questions the desirability of owning New York City real estate. To buy and hold is to amass wealth—if you buy right.

"Buy cheap land near dear land" is the maxim of the shrewest investors. The dearest land in the country is at Wall Street and Broadway. The cheapest land in New York City, distance, improvements and transportation considered, is on Staten Island—almost in sight of the Battery—at South New York. $5 starts you, and the balance can be paid in easy monthly payments of $5 and upwards.

The Staten Island movement has only just begun. Will you get aboard now, or wait?

Now, won't you sit down and give us a chance of telling you our story? It won't take long and it will be interesting. We will send you some astonishing facts about New York and its marvelous growth that will interest you. You don't object to getting this, do you? All right. Sit right down now—not to-morrow—to-morrow ruined Napoleon. To-day—now—this minute. A pen full of ink—a postal card—a minute's time—may bring you a fortune. Isn't it worth while? Remember, our offer also carries a free deed in case of death, high-class improvements free, a free round trip (railroad fare) to New York—east of Chicago or like distance (not exceeding $36).

Send us your name to-day for full particulars, or should you feel so disposed, it may be well to get best choice by sending us the first payment of $5 upon the distinct understanding that if you are not satisfied with our selection, we will return your $5.

A CHRISTMAS LULLABY

"Fell the angels' songs, and the world was gay; and we think of it all on Christmas Day"

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

D. W., Easton, Pa. In a sermon on the text "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise" the preacher altered the sentence by changing the comma from before the word to-day to after it, and changing "shalt thou" to "thou shalt," making the sentence read, "I say unto thee to-day, thou shalt be with me in Paradise," thus putting a different and more comprehensive construction on the sentence. Is there any justification in making such transpositions?

The best scholarship does not justify such a change in the text. The original is closely followed both in the Authorized and Revised Versions. The obvious meaning, according to the best commentators, is that Jesus was assuring the penitent that, as the reward of his faith, he would not be separated from his Lord. The word "Paradise" was used by the Jews to express both the higher and the lower states of future bliss, so that in this view the Saviour's assurance was that the spirit of the penitent would enter immediately after death into that state or condition of bliss which was suited to it. What that condition was has been a matter of wide discussion. Jesus, after his death on the cross, was to enter the realm of the dead, which is for some already a paradise where they enjoy communion with God, while for others it is a place of torment.

G. B. A., Lansing, Mich. Please print a programme and suggestions for giving an old folks' concert.

Have every member dressed in ancient style, poke-bonnets, or those of the style of fifty years ago; kerchiefs and pinafores, coifs and high combs and ringlets; bell-crowned hats, knee-breeches, queues, powdered hair, buckled shoes—anything antique. They need not all be of the same period. Search the old hymn and music books for good hymns and chorals. Use tuning-forks and bassoons. If an old harpsichord is in the neighborhood, give one or two pieces on it. Provide variety in solos, duets, quartettes and choruses. Recitations of quaint, old-fashioned pieces might be interspersed with the music. Possibly, if well conducted, a brief reproduction of class recitation in an old-fashioned district school might be introduced.

D., Baldwin, Kan. What course should be pursued with a young woman, a college graduate and a member of the church, whose family have done all in their power for her, yet who ignores them and treats them with contempt? Her home is darkened and her mother's heart is nearly broken by her conduct.

No words are strong enough to express the wickedness of anybody possessed of such advantages as you describe, yet who conducts herself so ungratefully. Only the Holy Spirit can soften so hard a heart and enlighten so perverted a mind.

G. and E., Waterbury, Conn. Who is the author of the hymn commencing:

"Vital spark of heavenly flame,
Quit, oh, quit this mortal frame"?

It is by Alexander Pope.

Y. Z., South Barrington, N. H. Please advise me about a going-away dress for a bride with light hair and blue eyes.

A bride's going-away dress may be of any color, not too light. The tan, gray, and blue and green shades are most usual. For your complexion, a deep blue would be becoming.

M. M. D., Los Angeles, Calif. 1. Whom did the children of the late Kings of Denmark and Sweden marry? 2. Who was the present Empress of Germany? 3. How many children has King George of Greece?

1. The late King Christian of Denmark had six children. Prince Frederick married Princess Louise of Sweden and Norway, in 1869. Alexandra, present Queen of Great Britain, married Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, in 1863. Prince George, now King of Greece, married the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia. Princess Dagmar, now Dowager Empress of Russia, married the late Czar Alexander III., in 1866. Princess Thyra married the Duke of Cumberland, son of the ex-King of Hanover, in 1878. Prince Waldemar married, in 1885, Princess Marie of Orleans, daughter of the Duke of Chartres. The late King Oscar of Sweden had four sons. The Crown Prince (now King) married, in 1881, the Princess of Baden. Prince Oscar married Lady Ebba Munck, one of his mother's maids of honor, and relinquished his rights to the throne. Prince Carl married, in 1897, Princess Ingeborg of Denmark. 2. The Empress of Germany was before her marriage Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg. 3. The King of Greece has five sons and one daughter.

J. L. M., Juniata, Pa. Is it possible for a person to seal his eternal doom, when young, by refusing to obey the Spirit's call?

We are warned against the danger of resisting the Holy Spirit, and Paul (Eph. 4:30) admonishes the believer not to grieve the Holy Spirit. It is possible for one to refuse to obey the call of the Spirit, yet without placing himself outside of the pale of redemption. The Bible itself furnishes several instances of this character. We should advise your friend to take a more hopeful attitude, and to seek God's mercy and forgiveness with a contrite heart, remembering that the promise of forgiveness extends to "whosoever" may come. Jesus saves to the uttermost, and has assured us that he will not reject any one who comes to him in this spirit. We can not set limits to God's mercy, and he is at all times more ready to forgive than we are to seek his forgiveness.

THE CHRISTMAS TREE

What do we care for the winds that blow?
What do we care for the clinging snow?
Christmas is coming, and, don't you see,
We're going to have a Christmas Tree!
And on the branches, high and low,
We'll tie bright holly and mistletoe;
And oh! the presents that we shall see
On Christmas morning, on that Tree!

In regard to a recent statement in THE MAIL-BAG in regard to Girard College, a former student sends us the following:

"In your issue of November 3, on the page headed "Our Mail-Bag," the following questions appeared: '1. By what means is Girard College, in Philadelphia, kept up? 2. Are men educated there for the ministry?' I was a pupil there from 1856 to 1862. During those years we had morning and evening chapel services; a lecture on some religious topic, with prayer and singing, each Sabbath morning, led by some prominent layman from the city or faculty, with Bible study in the afternoon. All the teachers were ladies and gentlemen of high Christian character, who at all times endeavored to impress upon us our need of Christ.

"Mr. Girard in his will stipulates, 'No ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose as a visitor within the premises appropriated to the purpose of said college.' Again, to those who should serve as teachers he says: 'Take pains to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that on their entrance into active life they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence toward their fellow-creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer.'"

"HARRY J. BOYDE."

J. J., Dayton, O. How does the question of the popular election of United States Senators stand at the present time?

Applications have been made by twenty-six State Legislatures to Congress for the calling of a convention to consider Constitutional amendments. When two-thirds of all the States make such application, Congress must act. The only way to bring about Senatorial elections by the people is by a Constitutional amendment. Five other States have passed resolutions or adopted petitions, but have not complied fully with the statutory requirements.

Mrs. G. J. B., Katonah, N. Y. 1. How can I organize a sewing school for poor girls? 2. Would it be a good plan to serve light refreshments, perhaps once a month; provide music or other entertainment occasionally? 3. Where can I get books on the subject of teaching sewing?

1. Begin with a few girls, and teach them once a week the simple stitches, "over and over," hemming, running, over-casting. Soon grades can be formed, and the more deft can begin upon fancy stitches and embroidery. Before long, garments and fancy articles might be undertaken, for sale. 2. By all means serve refreshments, and have music and recitations occasionally. Make the school as attractive as possible. Reading aloud to the girls while sewing should not be attempted until they have become fairly proficient. The Harpers, the Butterick Publishing Company, New York, and many other firms publish books upon sewing.

Reader, Oregon. "I read a few weeks ago a question in regard to the marriage of two quick-tempered persons. Young people who have quick tempers, which they do not expect to be able to control to such an extent that they may live justly and pleasantly with those to whom they come nearest, need not expect to be happy in life under any circumstances. No such person or persons should marry until self-control is determined upon and victory fairly assured. Those who are not restrained by the bond of love will not allow such a person to abuse them, and he may perforce become more self-controlled. The root of a quick temper, whether it indicates itself by sudden, fiery anger and bitter words, by sullen, cold silence, or by impatience and fault-finding, is always the same—selfishness, deep-seated and sinful."

Miscellaneous

H. M. G., Hamilton, O. We are unable to answer your question. It is one the best theologians have never settled.

Mrs. H. H. A., Elkton, Md.; and James M. Washburn, Marion, Ill. Two large public libraries in New York have been thoroughly searched in vain to find the poem for which you ask.

N. C. B., Cylon, Wis. 1. We know of no such references of Christ outside those to be found in the New Testament. 2. Matthew wrote his Gospel first in Hebrew, or Syro-Chaldaic, and afterward in Greek, and Luke and John theirs in Greek.

E. L. M., New York. There are two passages which may help you to decide the question: Ps. 41:1 and Prov. 19:47. Further, in the present case, the obvious duty would seem to be emphasized by I. Tim. 5:8. In view of these very clear Scriptural admonitions, your friend would seem bound to extend the help mentioned, even if he has to make sacrifice to do so.

F. C. M., Cedarville, N. Y. Clinton B. Fisk, patriotic soldier, philanthropist, reformer, was a man above aspersion. He made a competence in business, and gave years of active service to many religious and reform movements, laboring jointly with such men as the late General O. O. Howard. He was Prohibition candidate for President in 1888, and his nomination honored the party. Your friend is woefully mistaken and shows ignorance of the facts in making his assertion.

Reader, Chehalis, Wash. God's mercy is boundless as the sea, and Jesus "saves to the uttermost." He has given us the assurance that no one who comes to him in the contrite spirit, and accepts him in faith as Saviour, will be "cast out," and moreover, this divine invitation is not to a class or a select number, but to all. As to your own case, we would say that none of us can ever attain to perfection in this life, but his righteousness covers all our imperfections. Trust in him, live close to him, and his love will kindle love in you and help you to cast out fear.

Handsomest of All Calendars

Dear Christian Herald: Thanks for the book, The Story Bible, which is very nice, and also for the pictures, which are beautiful. I think the calendar is much the handsomest of all you have had, and they were all very nice. But these two pictures are very beautiful. We have taken your paper many years.

NICARAGUA AND ITS PEOPLE

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

Special Pan-American Railway Commissioner

NICARAGUA—the scene of a revolution and of recent events which greatly concern the American people—is the largest of the Central American countries. Its area is nearly fifty thousand square miles. It presents a great variety of physical characteristics.

The total population of Nicaragua is about two hundred thousand, and consists chiefly of the Indian races, with an admixture of Spanish blood. On the Atlantic coast the Mosquito Indians form a very distinct race, who have maintained a condition of semi-independence while acknowledging in a partial way the authority of the Nicaraguan government.

As everywhere in the tropics, the people seem to those coming from the North very indolent, yet somehow they do a fair amount of work under a very hot sun or under drenching skies. Of the men a good many are in the army. Barefoot soldiers, with frayed, scarlet trousers, are very common. New uniforms are not distributed often. Each soldier, however, has a bayonet, and sometimes a mere boy will be seen carrying a bayonet twice his own length.

The women do much of the work. They, too, usually are barefoot. They wear an abundance of ornaments, beads, necklaces and earrings. Often their entire worldly possessions are in this sort of jewelry. One of the native arts is that of making pottery, and it is an interesting sight to watch a group of women with the water-jars balanced on their heads swinging along at an easy gait as unconcernedly as if their burden were a feather. They are very effusive in their greetings of one another, usually kissing on each cheek and embracing when they meet. Social distinctions do not interfere with this custom. I have seen an elegantly attired woman of the wealthy class throw her arms about a poor creature who could boast of only rags for garments.

One of the tropical customs of Nicaragua to which the stranger becomes habituated is that of not being in a hurry at his meals. It is a good habit, too. The railroads are not quite up to the standard of the United States, and therefore do not have dining-cars. However, meals are provided at the stations, though no one would be content with the American practice of stopping the train only twenty minutes for breakfast or dinner, as the case might be. Instead, a full hour is given, and often longer.

Once, while making the journey from Corinto to Granada, I asked my fellow-passengers if we would have time enough for breakfast at the station which was indicated as a "meal station." "Plenty of time, Señor," they all responded cheerfully. Soon the train stopped at a siding, in the midst of a beautiful grove. A number of tables were spread in the open, after our picnic fashion. We seated ourselves and enjoyed a very bountiful repast, beginning with soup and ending with delicious fruits. When we were through, I noted that about three-quarters of an hour had passed, but nobody was going back to the train. Instead, most of the passengers found shady places and stretched themselves out for a siesta. Not being sleepy, I hunted up the conductor and asked him if there would be time for me to stroll through the village.

"Certainly, Señor," he replied, "I'll hold the train for you."

So I took my walk, and in the course of half an hour came back. The train was ready, but nobody seemed annoyed at my delaying it. I started to apologize to the conductor, but he said I need not mind, since both he and the engineer had taken a little longer siesta than usual.

People going from New Orleans or Mobile reach Nicaragua on the Atlantic side at Bluefields or Greytown, but the quickest way to get to the capital is to go to Panama and then up to Corinto. Entering the roadstead at Corinto, there is a fine view of the volcanoes Momotombo and El Viejo. Ashore, one walks from the landing into the primeval tropical forest. The screeching of parrots greets the ear rather unpleasantly. The tones are a little softer than when the parrot is transported to the North, but it is not a song bird and its tones cannot be considered musical, especially when they are heard in contrast with some of the real songsters of these forests. The chattering of the monkeys sometimes is also heard. Once, just on the edge of a forest, I thought I heard two squirrels chattering, but it proved to be two monkeys, which were making faces at each other while at the same time their conversation seemed to be quite amiable, for one of them was stroking the face of the other.

The railway runs from Corinto to Granada on the shores of Lake Nicaragua. It passes through Leon, which is the largest city in Nicaragua and the centre of considerable commerce. There is a university at Leon, and a good many foreigners are engaged in business there. They include Americans, Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans and Chinese. Leon is, or used to be, an early-to-bed town. When I was there a few years ago the military band played in the park till eight o'clock, and then the people went home. At nine o'clock the cathedral bell rang as a sort of a curfew signal, which was supposed to indicate that everybody was in bed.

Managua, the capital, is a beautifully located little city, on the shores of Lake Managua, with green mountains rising all around. It is famous for orange and silver-gray sunsets. The town spreads around like a crab. Managua was made the capital because the cities of Leon and Granada were always quarreling for the honor, and starting revolutions against each other. So a compromise was made by selecting a town half way between them. The President's palace is the most pretentious building in Managua, but it is not very pretentious after all.

Granada is the prettiest city in the country. Its drawback is the earthquakes, though as a rule these disturbances are not very severe. Usually they content themselves with shaking down the tile roofs of such houses as may be of two stories.

The railway runs in a horseshoe loop up the mountain side, around Lake Apoyo. This lake, although in the interior, is of salt water. The view from its shores is a magnificent one. The volcanoes Santiago and Mochamba dominate it, while off to the south is the rim of volcanic peaks which mark Costa Rica. One night I looked down from the shores of Lake Apoyo on Granada, sleeping in the moonlight. It seemed like a city of monoliths. The lake was like a sheet of silver dotted with green islets, while the dense hillside forests dropped gently into the valleys, which are clothed with eternal verdure.

Nicaragua has great natural wealth. Its forests, which are chiefly on the Atlantic slope, contain many rare woods. Coffee is cultivated in the highlands, while in the lowlands cacao or chocolate is grown. A famous French brand of chocolate is obtained from Nicaragua plantations. There are extensive cattle ranges. There are gold mines, which it is believed will some day be the source of great wealth. A stable government, which will insure internal peace and afford proper protection to foreigners, will be sure to result in the development of the country.

On account of the revolution now going on in Nicaragua, and the steps taken by our government to defend the interests of Americans and to restore peace in Central America, Mr. Pepper's foregoing article on the country and people is of unusual interest, written as it is from an expert knowledge of the subject.

One change after another comes so rapidly in the Nicaraguan situation that it is unsafe to predict, even a day ahead, the immediate outcome. Before this strikes the eye of the reader President Zelaya may be a fugitive and the insurgents in possession of the capital city, Managua; or the insurgent party may be defeated and Zelaya's hands so strengthened that he may offer a formidable opposition to any land operations our marines may undertake.

After the larger part of the fleet of cruisers and gunboats had reached the Nicaraguan coasts, with about 1,500 marines, there was a temporary lull in our warlike activity until the forces sent from Philadelphia and other ports should reach the scene of trouble. The gunboat Princeton sailed from San Francisco, and, after coaling on the way, joined the Vicksburg at Corinto. The cruiser Brooklyn is getting ready to take more marines to Nicaragua, if necessary, being fitted up as a transport at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Several other ships have been ordered to the naval rendezvous at Hampton Roads.

President Taft, in his message to Congress, went over the different steps which had been taken to maintain American prestige in Central America, and he has the undoubted support of the Senators and Representatives. At present our government is awaiting the result of what has already been done or ordered. It is now the time for President Zelaya to clear himself of the charges made, if he can. Our consul at Managua, Mr. Harry Caldera, reported on December 8 that an attempt had been made to start an anti-American uprising in that city, but that it had turned out a complete failure. He also reported that the people were ready to rise against their tyrannical President, if they thought that the United States would protect them. The State Department has been anxious concerning the safety of our consuls in Nicaragua, as they have been continually harassed and menaced, and if the followers of Zelaya should think it to their advantage the menaces would probably be followed by some overt act. Our consuls have shown great grit and courage in sticking to their posts while in the power of a hostile and unscrupulous government.

As soon as Zelaya found that Washington intended to bring him to terms he was more anxious than ever to crush the insurgents, so that he could have an undivided force at his command if the Americans tried to force their way into the interior. His soldiers made a desperate attack on the army of General Estrada, and a sanguinary battle followed. The insurgents, however, were able to check the national forces, and with considerable loss, leaving Zelaya in a much worse position than before, both as to his domestic and foreign relations.

General Vasquez, who commanded the government troops in the last battle, is now in disfavor with Zelaya and is threatened with court-martial.

Estrada has fortified himself at Rama, and his position is considered by military men as impregnable. His men destroyed all provisions and forage when they fell back toward Rama, and General Aseja, who is acting for Zelaya, has not been able to supply his troops with proper food. They are in poor condition consequently to force an engagement, but Aseja must either fight or starve, and he will probably fight. Rama is the key to the military situation. Zelaya can never hope to regain the Atlantic coast of his country unless his flag flies above its walls, as it commands the only means of communication to the east.

One rumor from Managua is that Zelaya may resign as the result of pressure brought to bear on him. It is said Great Britain demands his resignation.

One interesting development is the new relations of some of the Central American States. Zelaya has been the disturbing factor, but the present attitude of our government has given needless alarm to the other Central American governments, and they seem inclined to support him against the United States. The diplomats representing those countries meet nightly in Washington, and one of them has suggested that they form the United States of Central America, but considering the fact that one State cannot live at peace it is not likely that the diverse elements of the several independent republics will form a permanent union for some time to come at least. A revolution has just broken out in Honduras, led, it is supposed, by some one who desires to help Zelaya.

It has been reported that both Cannon and Groce, the Americans, were killed shortly after being captured, without even the formality of a trial, the bodies being denied Christian burial. Both men were wealthy, the latter owning mines worth several million.

Relatives of the dead men have gone to Nicaragua in an endeavor to secure part of the property, but in the present condition of affairs there seems little prospect of the success of their mission. Of course, in the end, whichever party is victorious, an indemnity will have to be paid to the families of the murdered Americans.

MIGHTY WORKERS IN THE LORD'S VINEYARD

Gipsy Smith's Evangelistic Tour

GIPSY SMITH'S series of Gospel meetings in Cincinnati closes one of the most remarkable evangelistic tours ever held in this country. One minister remarked at the commencement of the meetings that, knowing the Cincinnati people as he did, he would not have been surprised if the meetings had been attended by Christians only. Gipsy Smith, however, possesses the wonderful gift of being able to unite the ministers of the various bodies, which assures success. Starting in Cincinnati with a banquet given in his honor by the business men and ministers of the city, he captured the hearts of the people before the meetings actually began. For sixteen days he packed the Walnut Theatre at noon, while crowds were turned away daily. In the evening, the Music Hall—the largest available building—was also the scene of remarkable gatherings.

Gipsy Smith

The responses to the evangelist's appeals have been numerous, and, as the enquiry room was overcrowded, he had to adopt different methods in dealing with the many converts. In this mission the Gipsy was assisted by his son Albany, who is also a Gospel singer of note. The duets sung by father and son were very effective. Their beautiful rendering of "He Lifted Me" was received with applause daily at both the theatre and Music Hall.

Gipsy Smith sailed for England on December 8, on the Lusitania, to fulfil a number of engagements, among them being a mission in Paris. An effort is being made to secure him next season on the Pacific Coast, at such places as Portland, Ore.; Seattle, San Francisco and Los Angeles. A. SHELDRICK.

Death of Bishop Goodsell

BISHOP DANIEL AYRES GOODSELL, of the M. E. Church, died in New York on Sunday, December 5, at the ripe age of seventy years. He had been an invalid for several months. He was born in Newburgh, N. Y., November 5, 1840, and was educated at New York City University and Wesleyan University. From 1880 to 1888 he was literary editor of the Christian Advocate, and was also secretary to the Methodist Episcopal Board of Education. Elevated to the bishopric in 1888, he traveled extensively in China, Japan, Korea, Italy, Bulgaria, Switzerland, Germany, Scandinavia and Finland. He was a frequent contributor to reviews and periodicals, and published two books, Nature and Character at Granite Bay, in 1901, and Things Which Remain, in 1904. He succeeded the late Bishop Charles H. Fowler as resident Bishop of New York in May, 1909, and was at one time pastor of the New York Avenue M. E. Church in Brooklyn, and had had parishes in New Haven and Meriden. Before his appointment in 1908 to New York he was resident Bishop in Boston. He was the editor of the Methodist Church Discipline, which forbids dancing and certain other amusements.

In a very interesting sketch of the late Bishop Goodsell, in the Christian Advocate, this incident is related: "He had been in college three years and a half and was nearing graduation when one day one of the veterans said to him: 'If you are ever going to preach it is now time that you should begin. I am going to announce tonight that some one is to preach in my church on Friday night whom I never heard preach, whom they never heard preach, and whom nobody else ever heard preach.' Goodsell prayed to be delivered from it, but the note of duty and the feeling that he was called of God came upon him. The official board licensed him as a local preacher, and he was received in the conference in 1859, when he was eighteen and a half years old." We have few eighteen-year-old preachers nowadays, but young Goodsell had in him, both by inheritance and training, the qualities which were destined to develop in later years and to make their possessor a mighty influence for the upbuilding of Christ's kingdom upon earth. His widow and two daughters survive him.

The Conversion of Hedwig Wangel

Farewell Appeal of the Brilliant German Actress in Bidding the Stage Good-by Forever

IN a recent issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD briefly announced the conversion of Hedwig Wangel, a popular actress of Berlin. Further details, received a few days ago, reveal a remarkable story, illustrating the transforming power of the Holy Spirit upon a human heart.

Frau Wangel for several years has been one of the leading stage favorites of Berlin, Frankfort, and other German cities. She is an actress of great emotional powers, and her great talent has won her the admiraton of large audiences of the best class wherever she has appeared. In August last, she was filling an engagement in one of the leading playhouses in Frankfort, and having one evening disengaged, she, led apparently by some whim or caprice, went to a Salvation Army meeting. On that particular evening—it was the 27th of August—the leader of the meeting, Captain Olyphant, made an earnest appeal to those present to forsake their sins and accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour and Guide henceforth. He urged them to depend thereafter not on human help in directing their lives and actions, but on the divine Helper. He invited those who desired to give their hearts to God to come forward to the altar. Frau Wangel, who had been strangely moved by the simple yet eloquent words of the speaker, was one of the first to come forward. She then fell upon her knees and offered up an impassioned prayer for forgiveness and acceptance. The scene was a surprise to her friends; but the brilliant and talented actress was never so much in earnest. She had reached the spiritual turning-point of her life, and as she knelt she poured out her heart in her prayer, with a fervor that seemed inspired.

Naturally, the conversion of Hedwig Wangel the popular actress created a sensation not only in Frankfort, but in other German cities. On August 31 she went to Munich, where she had to fulfil an engagement at a leading theatre. Three days later, she went to Berlin, where she was announced to play the role of "Martha." These engagements she felt compelled to fill, as they had been previously arranged and could not be canceled without serious trouble and loss. Meanwhile, her every thought was of her new spiritual experience, which brought with it a certain religious exaltation. She felt impelled, at whatever sacrifice, to cut loose from the stage. Her friends and her husband opposed this, but she swept their objections aside. Her decision brought about a temporary domestic separation; but she had seen a new light and had resolved to follow it at whatever cost. "After that last performance of 'Faust,'" she said, "I left the stage, never again to enter the temple of my art, as I have now consecrated myself to God."

In a remarkable farewell letter to her fellow-artists, Frau Wangel gave a new revelation of the change that had been wrought in her heart and life by the converting and transforming power of the Holy Spirit. To these former colleagues she wrote, in substance:

"My Dear Friends: Peace be with you. This is a thing which you should recall whenever you think of me. When you speak of me, your words will not have the same sound as in the past. If in the past I have fought for truth with means that were tainted, I ask you now, the friends and colleagues of my shameful vocation, not to take it as an example. Truth does not come to us by human efforts; it is of God alone, and the Bible is his holy Word."

She did not wish "to write a thesis," the letter explained. She knew that in every man's breast there is a cry for deliverance from vice, for liberation from the chains of error and sin, and a desire to learn the mysteries which surround us. Even Nietzsche had expressed this desire when he declared that eternity alone could contain the noblest joys of which the human heart could conceive. Salvation from condemnation and corruption; help in sickness and in all earthly trials; comfort and consolation at the close of life, a holy peace in the hour of death, and the assurance of a glorious resurrection—these were God's gifts to the believing soul. In her letter she went on to ask her friends and colleagues if they shared any of these sentiments, or even a single one. She pleaded with them that her example and experience should urge them to a better life. Otherwise, she wrote, it would rob them of their peace of mind. They should search and strive to find that source of all help—Jesus. She herself had experienced this search, and it had brought her peace and happiness.

Frau Hedwig Wangel

Several times in this remarkable letter Frau Wangel refers to the stage as a profession of sin and shame: "the theatre, which fouled my soul and my body." It is in the nature of a confession, the unburdening of a soul just illuminated, and looking back shudderingly upon its former conditions and surroundings. Indeed, she even quotes the language of Christ himself to justify her public avowal of her new-found faith: "Every one who shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man also confess before the angels of God."

"I am not ashamed of the Gospel," Frau Wangel's letter continues. "Good-by, dear colleagues and friends, this is enough for to-day. I have been led to see the way clearly, and I know that God gives power to the weak. Upon his promises in the Gospel I rest in confidence." She refers dramatically to the spiritual darkness of the Jews: "O Judaism, how far art thou in error! Seek Moses, and he will lead thee to Christ; live like Abraham; he sacrificed everything that was his to go into a land which the Lord showed him. Can God again engraft the princely vine into the olive tree?"

This singular letter closes with special greetings to all of the German dramatic associates who helped the writer in her work. "But what is that work to me now?" she asks. "They may answer for themselves. Jesus will draw all things unto himself, and the unfaithful stewards, who made a wicked use of the talents entrusted to them, he will surely destroy." She also has a solemn word of warning to all managers of theatres "who lead the public taste away from the truth, and to all poets who sow tares instead of wheat." "God's truth," she declares, "is eternally clean." When the heart has once been cleansed, we must pray that it be kept so continually. "My last words upon the boards, which represent the whole world, are these: 'Commit your soul to the mercy of God. Or would you still heap condemnation upon yourselves?'"

Frau Wangel's change of heart, and her abrupt desertion of the stage, while they came upon the public suddenly, are now believed to have been the result of days and weeks of deliberation, during which the Spirit was at work. The climax came dramatically, as already stated. She leaves the profession with the love and admiration of all of her former associates, and she has carried with her the enduring esteem of a very large proportion of the German people, who respect her high purpose and her sacrifice to principle of a position which many have envied.

Appreciates the Premiums

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received, in good condition, Mrs. Sangster's Story Bible, "The Daughters of Dorcas" and the beautiful "Dreamland" calendar, for which accept my sincere thanks. These are certainly appreciated, each and all. The Story Bible goes to the only one little child in my circle of influence, in the hope that the father may be led by the little child. There is indeed no other publication I know of that can bring so much of the right variety into my daily life as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. (MISS) I. D. GREENLEAF.

THE SCEPTRE OF WOMAN

By JOEL BENTON

AN AMERICAN POET'S REPLY TO THE ENGLISH POET'S ASPERSION

THE woman with pure lips to kiss
Knows nothing of the "serpent's hiss";
Nor is she, as has late been sung,
Acquainted with "the serpent's tongue."

She is as peaceful as a dove;
Her life is given to deeds of love;
As mother, through enduring years,
She wipes from childhood's face its tears.

In illness, on the fevered brow
She lays her hand—I feel it now—
And, pointing to health's upward slope,
Reveals the power of faith and hope.

She does not rudely ask the State
To be made man—at any rate;
She finds within the walls of home
Her larger Greece, her nobler Rome.

Lovely she is in every spot;
She will not be what she is not;
And him she takes, who comes to woo,
Will find her faithful, fond and true.

She knows that Nature's precious line
Goes on from her—dear and divine;
Is hers without a word's dispute,
With none to be her substitute.

'Tis she who quickens mind and soul;
For years she has them in control;
And all our restless sisters quote
Give her no wish to brawl or vote.

She is the world's true genesis,
The centre and the fount of bliss;
The pattern, as the years grow ripe,
Of that which makes the Angel type.

Divinely fair, nurtured on high,
And flawless as the azure sky,
She shuns loud fame, dismisses strife,
And reigns as mother, sister, wife.

The Unchanging Christ

TEXT—Heb. 13:8
"Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever"

"PASSING away" is written on the world and all that the world contains. Change is the order of all things terrestrial. Vicissitude governs human life. All nature is controlled by this great law. The "eternal" hills are changing, and by the sure process of disintegration are passing away; the deep sea is slowly filling up, and scientists tell us that even the sun is decreasing in diameter at the rate of nine inches per day, shrinking five feet per week, one mile in twenty years. Mutability is stamped on all sublunary things. Look at the fate of the summer flowers: though in full bloom at daybreak, yet ere evensong they droop and fade. The sweetest songbird must, in a brief space of time, cease its singing. The giant oak of the forest must at last totter and fall. All things in this fair world must decay.

The Flying Years

The individual changes. We ourselves are not as we were. The fancies of our youth and the dreams of other days are gone. Those we love are not where they were; in far too many cases their places are empty, and the familiar faces become fewer, and all is changed. The old order in all things passeth away, and the unaccustomed new cometh in its place. "As we journey on through life we leave many things behind us. We can never go back again over the years that are past. We never go over any life path a second time. We never pass a second time through precisely the same experience. We have infancy once, childhood once, youth once, manhood and womanhood once, old age once, and we die once. We are forever leaving things, places, conditions and experiences behind us."

However important our lifework may be, by this same law of change we are gradually slipping away from it. The morning of life is succeeded by the afternoon, and the afternoon by the evening, and when evening comes we must lay down our work, and leave much unfinished which we had fondly hoped to complete. However indispensable a great preacher, a brilliant writer, or a master musician may seem to be, this world cannot retain them. Earth's sweetest singer must lose her entrancing vocal powers, the hand of the true-born artist must lose its cunning, the most gigantic intellect grow weary, and finally rest in death. This transitory world of ours could not retain its Homer, Dante and Shakespeare; its Augustine, Luther and Wesley; its Handel, Mendelssohn and Mozart; its Tintoretto, Raphael and Turner. These great men are gone, and all the great ones in the world to-day are just as surely going.

All Earthly Things Unstable

Ideas change, thoughts and feelings change, our friends change. The friends of our youth are gone, or have passed out of our circle. Those who vowed eternal friendship, it may be, can now pass us by and greet us not. The experiences of an earlier time are not the experiences of to-day. However much we may long for the return of youthful thrills of happiness, they come not to us. Time has carried us on and on, and inevitably we have left much behind.

When for vanished days we yearn,
Days which never can return, when the instability of all earthly things is borne in upon our hearts, where shall we turn, to whom shall we flee for help? Is there no one who will remain the same, who will abide with us whatever changes come?

Thank God, there is—"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." Whatever changes the years bring to us, if he is our Friend, he will remain the same Christ, unchanged, unchanging. He will not fail or disappoint us. There will never be an experience through which he cannot safely take us. There will never be a path over which he cannot safely conduct us. There will never be a battle which he cannot help us to fight. There will never be a dark valley which he cannot light up for us. He has promised, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." He is no transient Christ, here to-day and gone to-morrow. He is not subject to the great law of change. He is the deathless Christ. "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore!" Hallelujah to the unchanging, undying Christ of God!

And now let us consider a few of the truths which this subject ought to teach us.

Man's Deepest Need

The very first verse of this wonderful Epistle to the Hebrews tells us that "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." In the ages preceding the coming of Christ God had given a partial revelation of himself by lawgiver and priest, by prophet and seer, by type and shadow, by offering and sacrifice, by the inspired messages his servants gave to the people, and by his unmistakable guidance and discipline and oversight of the Hebrew race. But that revelation was dim, imperfect and incomplete. Some clearer, fuller and more positive manifestation was needed. And in due time God sent his well-beloved Son, and in him the revelation of the Father was completed. The finality of the divine revelation in Christ need not be doubted. It is inconceivable that Christ himself should be superseded by a higher manifestation or fuller communication of God to man. Jesus Christ, therefore, is the unchanging, supreme and final manifestation of God. Here, then, is that which we so deeply need, a certainty concerning the nature and character of God. Here is a foundation upon which we may safely build, an anchorage safe and sure, a revelation that will not prove elusive and vain.

And is not this man's deepest need—to know God? Is there any cry that comes up from the heart of man more real and persistent than the cry that we may see the Father? Deep down in the heart of man is the cry, "Oh that I knew where I might find Him!" Many are seeking after God if haply they may find him. Many are saying, "Show us the Father." Many are feeling as did a poor old woman in Africa when she said, "This soul of mine I cannot fathom, but my heart is bleeding for God."

Far and wide, though all unknowing,
Pants for thee each mortal breast;
Human tears for thee are flowing,
Human hearts in thee would rest.

To find God in nature is not enough. It does not satisfy. The vision is partial and imperfect. To find God in the lives of his saints is not sufficient. God in others, though very near, is still too far away for the individual soul. We personally, for ourselves, want to see and know God. Where can we find him? The answer is—in Christ. The only way of getting a knowledge of God is to look to Christ. He is "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person." When you find the Christ he will show God to your heart. How precious, then, is this truth, that Jesus Christ is revealing the Father "yesterday, and to-day, and forever." Therefore your opportunity has not gone by. You may know the Father.

The Abiding Anchorage

He is the Saviour "yesterday, and to-day, and forever." He is, as this Epistle to the Hebrews tells us, the one eternal, faithful High Priest, whose priesthood knows no change or termination. "Wherefore also he is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

Whatever views we may hold concerning the doctrine of the Atonement, are there not times in each life when we are deeply conscious of sin in the heart; when purity and goodness seem far removed from us; when we are crushed with the sense of moral unworthiness and weakness? Who will help us in that hour? Where shall we turn then? Will strict self-denial, performing works of charity, and doing penance avail? Will palliating our sin, blaming heredity or environment, or explaining it away, bring quietness to the heart? Nay, there is only one Centre to which we may turn then, only one Person to whom we may apply, the unchanging Christ, the world's Redeemer.

I do believe that the quickened and enlightened Christian conscience, crushed with the sense of moral unworthiness and sin, does still find comfort and help in the atonement of Christ on the cross. It cannot be denied that throughout the ages, and even to-day, in this land and many lands, multitudes do find in "Christ and him crucified the power of God unto salvation." Where in God's world is there any one who can bear away our sin if we turn from the Christ? "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Thank God, Jesus Christ is the Saviour "yesterday, and to-day, and forever"! The most sinful may turn to Christ and say, "He loved me, and gave himself for me." He "bore my sins in his own body on the tree." "I am redeemed." Millions have believed in the atonement as a fact, and by simple faith in Christ have been redeemed from sin, even in this life; and, because Jesus Christ is unchanging, you and I and all men may find in him full salvation.

Earth's Great Ones Pass Away

There are no words, perhaps, in the Bible more familiar to Christians than certain words which are spoken in this Epistle about his help and friendliness. Listen! "We have not a High Priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmitics; but one that hath been in all points tempted as we are." And in the chapter from which our text is taken we read: "For he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me." Is it not true to-day that we need the Helper and Friend of mankind? Our struggle and our sorrow assure us that we cannot go on without his strength and without his help. We are dependent creatures—dependent in manhood as well as in childhood. Even the wealthiest, the wisest, the mightiest cannot stand alone. There are times when we specially need help.

In the verse preceding our text we read: "Remember them that had the rule over you"; and a literal translation is: "Remember your leaders, them that have had the rule over you"; and the reference is to departed chiefs. Stephen, the protomartyr, had gone. James had been beheaded, possibly James the Less had also been slain, and it may have been that Peter had been crucified. Others whose names are written in heaven had passed to their reward. Many leaders had gone, but the writer reminds the Hebrew Christians that Jesus Christ remained with them, "the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever."

How precious is this truth in our day, when some great national leader is removed from our midst! When a Lincoln, a Gladstone, or a Bismarck is removed from the life of the nation, "What a calamity!" we say. "Who will be found to take their place and carry on their work?" When the nation seems to rock and reel, it is good to remember that the unchanging God is our refuge and strength, and the unchanging Christ is still in the midst to steady our faith, preserve our confidence, and raise up others to fill the breach. So, too, when great leaders in the church are called to their reward. When men like Henry Ward Beecher, Richard Storrs, Charles Haddon Spurgeon, Henry Drummond, Dwight L. Moody are transplanted, and the church weeps and mourns, how good to remember that Jesus Christ remains, and though he buries his workmen he lives to carry on his work!

"Lo, I Am With You Alway"

And when our personal friends are taken from us—when a beloved pastor, a minister with a masculine mind and a sympathetic nature, who has been to us a tower of strength—when some companion, counselor and friend, to whom we so often turned for comfort and help—or some one from our own family circle, who was knit to our heart of hearts—when these are severed from us we can still turn to the One who in loving accents is ever saying, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end."

And in the time of doubt, unbelief and perplexity we need the Helper and Friend of mankind. We live to-day amid intense controversy. It can be felt whenever one comes in contact with life. Controversy in government, education, art, literature,

President Taft at the Bowery Mission

A Night Visit in a Pouring Rain and a Cheering Message to the Unemployed

MONDAY, Dec. 13, 1909, will be a memorable day in the history of the Bowery Mission. President Taft, who had been speaking at a mass meeting in Carnegie Hall, at the conclusion of that meeting was whirled downtown in his automobile to the Bowery. The Presidential party who followed occupied several Stearns taxicabs, which made most excellent time in spite of the heaviest rainstorm the city had known in many months.

It was nearly 11 o'clock P.M. when they reached the Mission. Uniformed police and detectives in plain clothes guarded all the entrances. Everything, however, was quiet and orderly and the guardians of the peace were themselves deeply interested spectators of the proceedings.

The usual Gospel service was in progress when the autos reached the rear entrance, and when President Taft stepped from his machine he heard the big audience of Bowery men singing the Mission's favorite hymn, "I'm Holding On," to the accompaniment of organ and piano. As he passed through the hallway and came upon the platform a tremendous burst of applause greeted him, which continued several minutes, the President bowing and smiling to the enthusiastic men before him.

On the platform beside the President were Dr. Louis Klopsch, the President of the Bowery Mission; Rev. Mr. Hallimond, Superintendent; "Mother" Bird, Bishop Darlington, of Harrisburg; Dr. Ferdinand Iglehart, Mrs. Klopsch, Mrs. Hallimond, Harry Steele Morrison, and a number of others.

After another "three rousing cheers for the President of the United States," called for by Dr. Klopsch, had been given with an energy and volume of sound that made Mr. Taft's smile broaden, Superintendent Hallimond told the men briefly that their distinguished guest had a message for them. The President rose and faced the men of the Bowery. For a moment he seemed to scan the faces individually, then he spoke in a clear and distinct voice, as follows:

"MY FRIENDS: I am just about as much surprised at being here as you are at seeing me. I had a note from your benefactor, Dr. Klopsch, asking me to come, after the meeting at Carnegie Hall, to the Mission which he has established in the Bowery.

"Now, I have known Dr. Klopsch personally not very long; but I have known him for a long while in the way that perhaps you do, by what he has done. [Cheers.]

"It has been my fortune in life to be a good deal of a sort of a figurehead. Some men do the work, while others are figureheads, and nature has developed me in such a way that I fill a pretty good part as a figurehead. [Cheers.] So they put me at the head of the Red Cross, and as head of the Red Cross I came to know of the enormous energy and tremendous power for good which Dr. Klopsch exercises through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in raising hundreds of thousands of dollars to relieve human suffering wherever it may be in the world.

"And so, when he wrote to ask me to come here, I wasn't exactly advised, except that it was in the Bowery. I always had a good deal of curiosity to know the Bowery, and I felt certain that where Dr. Klopsch and the Bowery met, there would probably be the best part of the Bowery, and so I came here. [Loud cheering.]

"Now, your superintendent has been good enough to say some complimentary things about my coming from Carnegie Hall down to the Bowery to meet you. I am not conscious of deserving any credit for it. As I look into your faces I see you are earnest American citizens. To use a colloquial expression, some of you are 'down on your luck,' but nevertheless, responsive to the same sentiments of loyalty and patriotism and love of country, and with the same ideals and aspirations for better things that are, I hope, shared by every man.

President Taft on the Platform of the Bowery Mission

"I am glad to be here, if by being here and saying so I can convince you that the so-called chasm between you and people who seem for a time to be more fortunate is not a chasm, and that there is extending through and between you and them a deep feeling of sympathy, a deep, earnest desire that you shall have that equality of opportunity—that means of getting on your feet, of supporting your family and of earning your livelihood—which we hope every man under the Stars and Stripes may fully enjoy.

"I am glad to come here and to testify by my presence here my sympathy with the great work of Dr. Klopsch in this Mission, by which he shall from time to time and constantly—but not always the same people—help men over hard places; help over the time when things seem desperate and when it seems as if the Lord and everybody else have turned against you, and to help you in those times to believe that there are people in this world who do sympathize with you, and who wish to help you to achieve better things.

"I know it is difficult for you to believe that I, who for the time being am receiving a large salary from the United States, and living in comfort, can understand or take into my heart the feeling you may have of desperation, and the sense of injustice you may have in feeling that you have not had the chances other men have had. Yet I assure you that in spite of those seeming differences your fellow-citizens and mine are not the greedy, oppressive persons some would make you believe; but that more to-day than ever in the history of the world their hearts are open and their desire to help the needy and the suffering is greater than it ever was, and is growing greater every minute.

"Dr. Klopsch is one of those through whom I hope that thought is being conveyed to you, so that you may not burn with a sense of injustice, but that you may hope on and struggle on, made strong in the belief that the future is brighter for you than before."

At the conclusion of the President's address there was an outburst of tumultuous applause from the men in the body of the hall, the visitors' galleries and the platform. He had touched a deep chord in the breasts of his hearers, and they felt that every word in this message of cheer and encouragement was spoken from the heart. Then after the applause had subsided the President and his immediate party rose to leave the platform. "Good night, boys!" said Mr. Taft, waving his hand in kindly greeting to the men. "Good night, Bill!" came back in a resounding, stentorian chorus. "Merry Christmas!" they called out as he withdrew, after shaking hands cordially with those on the platform. He did not leave the Mission building, however, until he had visited the quarters of the "Bread Line," on the floor below, and inspected the arrangements for feeding and comforting the thousands of homeless men and boys who come every midnight to be warmed and fed at the Bowery Mission.

After his departure, the Gospel meeting in the Mission hall went on with increased fervor. There was a new warmth in the "testimonies" that night, a deeper spirituality in the prayers and a higher note of praise and thankfulness in the hymns.

The police arrangements, under Inspector Hogan and Captain Day, were excellent. Owing to the stormy night there was no large outside crowd, and the approaches to the Mission, front and rear, were kept clear and well guarded. Never did President face a better behaved, more enthusiastic or more loyal audience than did Mr. Taft that night, and his words of kindness to the poor waifs of the Bowery will never be forgotten. He is the first National Executive who has set the example of coming down from his high station, for a single hour, and mingling with the "down-and-outs," and the men of the Bowery declare that the visit and the speech together have inspired them with fresh courage and done them a world of good.

commerce, and perhaps it is not surprising to find it in the church. The old foundations are being tested. The faith of many is being sorely tried. Many are crying out for a settled faith, but in the meantime they are in the mists of doubt. Many a brave soul is struggling toward the light through a dense darkness. This Epistle urges us to "cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward."

The remedy for doubt is in the unchanging Christ. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Truth is unchanging. The expression of truth changes, but the truth of God is eternal and changes not. In the confusion which often arises by changing the form of expressing a truth many lose faith, but back of all expression of the truth stands the eternal Truth, and back of that is the unchanging Christ. We cannot change him. He is greater than all creeds.

Supposing you are in doubt as to the meaning and mystery of the atonement? Why not find out what Christ himself said about his own death, and rest in that? Three days before his crucifixion he cried: "Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour. But for this cause came I to this hour," and in this cry there is the echo of words spoken months earlier: "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!" "The Son of Man," he said, "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." And in the solemn stillness of the Last Supper Jesus spake wonderful words: "Take, eat, this is my body broken for you. . . . Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood, shed for the remission of sins." And yet in face of that word men tell us that we owe the doctrine of the atonement to St. Paul.

The rest of faith is its greatest triumph, and that rest may be obtained in the unchanging Christ. This truth has its application in every variety of circumstances and experiences through which a Christian may be called to pass. We need the Helper and Friend of mankind (a) in the dark hour of temptation, (b) in the time of keen persecution, (c) when in the furnace of affliction, and especially (d) in the final hour and article of death. And what Jesus has been to his people in the ages gone by, that he will be to all his followers to-day.

Let us believe in the sufficiency of our Christ. He can do great things for us if we will. He has not done anything that he cannot do again. He has not given away his best gifts, so that he must be sparing and slow in his giving now. He has an unchanging and inexhaustible storehouse, and delights to give and give again, but he waits for our faith, our expectancy, our yearning. Take this precious truth home to your heart, and let your daily prayer be for faith in the unchanging Christ, and I pray that soon, by a deep, heartfelt experience, you may be able to say, "Thou, O Christ, art all I want."

THE BOWERY MISSION was highly honored on Monday evening, the 13th inst., when President Taft visited this "Gospel Lighthouse on the Bowery" and delivered a message of good cheer and encouragement to the men and the workers.

It is too late for detailed reports in this issue, but next week we shall give full particulars of this notable occasion. See his speech on page 1099.

National Comparisons

WE have now in course of preparation, and soon to be begun in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a series of articles by Mr. Edward R. Johnstone, making noteworthy comparisons between our own nation and other great powers. The purpose is to set forth those national and individual qualities, customs and attainments in which we excel other peoples and governments, and also, with equal fairness, those in which we fall behind our contemporaries. Both our glory and our shame will be made apparent, to the end that those who read may be helped to a better citizenship and purer patriotism. Every one will have it in his or her power to enhance our national credits, to reduce our common debits. Individual efforts in these directions may be diminutive, but aggregated they may become colossal.

These articles are intended to inform the public of facts it should know, and not to generate controversies that develop far more of bitterness than of betterment. The first of the series will appear shortly in these pages.

The President's Message

CONSERVATIVE, optimistic, business-like—these are the essential qualities that strike the average citizen who reads President Taft's 17,000-word Message to the Sixty-first Congress. While it does not treat exhaustively on all topics of public consequence, as many messages have done of late years, it is a clear and satisfactory presentation, as a whole, and promises to be supplemented by later special communications concerning our trouble with Nicaragua, the regulation of railroads and corporations and the conservation of the national resources.

Briefly stated, the outlines of the Message are these:

It announces that, while the deficit for the current year is $73,000,000, the surplus for the fiscal year ending June 31, 1911, will be $25,000,000. Rigid economy is urged in all governmental departments.

Bond issues are favored to pay for the Panama Canal, instead of paying their cost out of current funds. The canal will cost $375,000,000.

No more tariff tinkering at present, in order not to disturb business and check prosperity.

Lynchings and lawlessness in different States are declared to be largely due to the unjust, uncertain and dilatory methods of the courts.

The business outlook of the country is regarded as very hopeful. We are on the eve of "substantial business expansion." High prices for food products mean prosperity for the farmers, hut an increased burden upon those of moderate income. High prices prevail all over the world.

Our relations with Japan continue friendly.

A sugar fraud investigation by Congress is inadvisable while the Departments of Treasury and Justice are probing these frauds.

Incompetent and non-progressive Army and Navy officers should be weeded out, for the efficiency of the service.

The establishment of Postal Savings Banks is favored, also the granting of subsidies to build up our merchant marine.

There should be a consolidated Bureau of Public Health.

A Commission to investigate the law's delays and to decrea the cost of litigation is recommended.

An appropriation of $50,000 is favored to investigate the "white slave traffic."

Diplomatic appointments should be made wholly with a view to the fitness of the appointees.

American business interests abroad should be fostered and protected.

A national celebration in 1913 of the fiftieth anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation is recommended.

Civil pensions are urged for superannuated government employees.

The practice and application of court injunctions should be modified by requiring notice, and the defendants should be given a chance to be heard.

New Mexico and Arizona should be admitted to Statehood separately.

By no means the least in importance among the President's recommendations is that which urges the need of a strong check to extravagance in appropriations. He takes the business-like view that the balance should be brought to the right side of the national ledger. It is something new to find an Executive who in his annual Message has not a single costly scheme to urge upon the country. To a dignified solicitude for the national welfare there is added a practical and sensible idea of bringing it about which inspires confidence. Further, there is no indication of any backward step in the various reforms promised at the outset of the present administration.

Our course in dealing with Nicaragua, the President declares, has been conservative. Undue interference has been avoided, but the charge of "unspeakable barbarities" made against Zelaya, the President-dictator, and the killing without trial of two Americans who were entitled to be dealt with as prisoners of war, have made a firm course on our part imperative. No injustice will be done to Nicaragua, but our government will perform its duty to American citizens and American interests as well as its moral obligations to civilization.

A Million for a Peace Fund

MR. EDWIN GINN, the Boston millionaire publisher, has decided to devote $50,000 a year toward a fund for the promotion of international peace. When he dies, he will bequeath $1,000,000 for the same fund. This is an excellent thing, and certainly no better use could be made of a good man's surplus wealth; but we trust that Mr. Ginn will see to it that the fund in question will be left so that it cannot be dissipated for the support of an army of mere "wind-jammers" and spread-eagle orators. If international peace ever prevails to any great extent in the world before the millennium—which is doubtful—it will not be brought about by flowery speeches and erudite essays of the top-loftical sort we hear so often in Boston and Mohonk assemblages. Fine talk and high-sounding resolutions cut a very small figure in the advancement of the great cause to which Mr. Ginn is so earnestly devoted, although they may help a little. What is needed is a strong educational propaganda, which will reach not only the young in the home, the school and the college, but will carry conviction to the business community—the merchant, the manufacturer, the capitalist. Ten years of such propaganda would make its mark upon the national sentiment, while fine speeches are, for the most part, forgotten as soon as they are printed.

Both Kinds of Trusts

"ARE all trusts necessarily bad and against the public welfare?" asks a correspondent. "May not a trust be beneficent?" It is quite conceivable that, under certain conditions, a trust may be a public benefit. Trusts are combinations of interests, for the purpose of avoiding excessive competition and for regulating and controlling the production and sale of something of commercial value for which there is general public demand. In this era of combination, many different kinds of trusts have come into existence; but those that most deeply interest the American people are the trusts that control the necessaries of life—milk, oil, sugar, coal, ice, flour—and the great system of industrial trusts, or combinations of corporations, under which many industries are grouped under one general management. Such combinations could be conducted beneficently, so that, while the cost of production would be greatly cheapened, the public would share the benefit in correspondingly lower prices and labor would profit by the increased numbers employed in the larger output; but the temptation to force up prices to an exorbitant degree would seem to be irresistible. We have illustrations of this general tendency in the disclosures in several trust investigations now under way. In the Ice Trust, the monopolists combined to reduce the supply, restrict and prevent competition and put up prices to the general consumer. It is this dangerous power of "squeezing" the public which constitutes the main charge against the trusts and calls for their regulation by laws that will protect the consumer while inflicting no injury upon any business that is fairly and legitimately conducted. It should not be forgotten, however, that the public hears only about the bad trusts, and knows little or nothing of those combinations that are honestly and honorably conducted, and through whose business enterprise and sagacity the people themselves become unconscious beneficiaries.

Dr. Klopsch Answers an Inquiry

QUESTION: Why does the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offer to send free with every renewal and new subscription that exquisite photogravure, "Daughters of Dorcas"? It would seem that the photogravure alone is worth two or three times the subscription price for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Answer: I have set my heart upon making this month—December, 1909—the record month in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I have taken this means for bringing about the desired result.

When our friends see the picture they will show it to their friends, and their friends (as a result) will become our friends, because it will induce them to subscribe.

Then, again, in a large subscription list like that of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD it often happens that people have to make a little sacrifice in order to subscribe at some particular time, and we are offering the picture to make it worth their while to inconvenience themselves a little, if necessary, and send in their subscriptions this month.

Thus, with renewals stimulated, and with new subscriptions induced by our generous offer, we expect that the results for December, 1909, will exceed the results of any other one month in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thus far.

I would consider it a personal favor if our subscribers would help me to accomplish all this, and, by a little work at this propitious season, aid me in my efforts to put the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on a higher plane and thus correspondingly extend the sphere of its beneficent influence.

Here is a little missionary work in which you may engage, and I feel confident that many of our subscribers will be glad to embrace the opportunity.

Only 9 days left. LOUIS KLOPSCH.

GENERAL NOTES

—STATISTICS GATHERED by the United States Geological Survey show that the annual death toll of the mines in this country is slightly decreasing, although it is still a very heavy one. In 1906, 2,061 miners were killed and 4,800 injured. In 1907, 3,125 died and 5,800 were injured—a death rate of 4.86 per 1,000, as against one death per 1,000 in European mines. 1908 showed 2,450 killed, or 675 less than the previous year, but the injured were 6,772, or 1,456 more than in 1907. European mines are subjected to a government test of devices relating to safety, and also of explosives, and rescue corps are better organized and equipped with modern apparatus. It is evident from these figures that our mining methods need revision and radical improvement.

—THE COOK-PEARY Polar war is apparently nearing a crisis, hut just how it will eventually turn out seems to be as doubtful as ever. Dr. Cook's records have reached Copenhagen, and Peary's have been under review by an American scientific society. To be thoroughly fair, each of the Danish and American bodies should have the privilege of examining both sets of records. Meanwhile, the warfare on Cook continues, the latest charge of the rival faction being that the "calculations and observations" which were forwarded to Copenhagen were prepared for the explorer after his return to Brooklyn, being written or compiled by a certain experienced sea captain, for a consideration. Dr. Cook, however, may have a reasonable explanation of this new accusation.

The Marvel of the Monorail

THE latest thing in rail transportation, which promises to prove of practical value, is the monorail car. Louis Brennan, the inventor, made a demonstration of the success of his experiment lately at Cullingham, England, when his car, on a single rail, balanced by gyroscopes, carried forty passengers around a circular track 220 yards in circumference. The British government has such faith in the novel enterprise that it is thought it will expend $500,000 in its practical use. The Brennan car is an improved type of the miniature car used by Professor A. S. Chessin in his demonstrations at Columbia University last March. Members of the Royal Society in England were astonished, years ago, when they saw a miniature car running along a span of tight rope and balancing itself. It ran on two wheels, and the reason it did not fall off to the ground was that it had a gyroscope attachment, which enabled it to keep its place. The full-sized car, which carried its precious freight so strangely the other day, is 40 feet long, 10 feet wide, and 13 feet high to the top of the cab, where the machinery is situated. It weighs 22 tons, and can carry 10 tons easily. It is balanced on a single rail by two gyroscopes, each 3 feet 6 inches in diameter, and weighing together one and a half tons. An engine on the car furnishes the electric power that drives the car and whirls the gyroscope. The monorail car can cross ravines and rivers on a single steel cable, and it can make the speed of a hundred miles an hour, allowing a man to take an early breakfast in New York and a late luncheon in Chicago. The wheels on which the monorail car runs, and the spinning wheels of the gyroscopes, are almost as mysterious as those the prophet Ezekiel saw in a vision accompanying the cherubim. These wheels seem to possess, in their ingenious mechanism, the intelligence and power of a living person, suggesting the divine energy which employs the steam, electric current and gravity in driving the car and in holding it properly balanced upon the track.

The Monorail Car in Operation at Cullingham, England

And when the cherubim went, the wheels went by them: and when the cherubim lifted up their wings to mount up from the earth, the same wheels also turned not from beside them. When they stood, these stood; and when they were lifted up, these lifted up themselves also: for the spirit of the living creature was in them. (Ezek. 10 : 16, 17.)

Softens a Burglar's Heart

A singular incident is told in a telegram of recent date from St. Louis. Mrs. Beulah Coleman, of Ferguson, was aroused from her slumber by a burglar in the house. Sitting up in her bed, by the dim light of a night-lamp she discovered the thief in the kitchen adjoining her bedroom. "You are a burglar, aren't you?" she asked of the figure. His silence convicted him. Using a low tone of voice, for fear she would wake her husband, asleep in the front room, and the children at her side, she said: "My husband is an invalid, and I am trying to support this little family. I presume you need the money, but I need it worse than you. You see these children who are dependent upon me, a woman; you are a man. It is for you to decide who needs the money most." The thief did not answer, but tossed her husband's pocketbook on the foot of the bed, took the jewelry out of his pocket and laid it on the dresser, and left. His savage, murderous nature was tamed by the pathos of a woman's love. It is not likely that this kind of treatment of burglars will become general, or that it should obtain. There are times when force would be more salutary in the protection of society against this most vile class of criminals; but the success of the woman in the incident illustrates the fact that there are sometimes decent impulses in the worst villain, which may be appealed to, and human sympathy and tenderness are far more potential than most people will admit in this struggling, selfish and strenuous age. In the Christian dispensation, while justice is not ignored, large emphasis is laid on the mastery of mercy and love. The Saviour taught that the way to win the heart of an enemy most completely was to feed and clothe him. The woman, by her kindness and the tenderness of her plea, put coals of fire on the head of the burglar and saved her treasure.

Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. (Rom. 12 : 20.)

The Radium Watch

A watch with a luminous dial has been invented, which is called the radium watch. The name is misleading, as radium is too expensive to be used in lighting up the face of a watch. It is like an ordinary watch, except that its face is illuminated by a new phosphorescent powder, whose brilliancy surpasses that of any heretofore seen. Only the hands are covered with it, and a small luminous point is placed on each of the hours. The watch is supplied with an alarm, which has a keen, loud ring, and those who for any reason want to know the time at night or who have to be awakened in the early morning will find this new invention of great benefit. Its cost is comparatively small, and it is likely to come into general use. Men have ever made devices for measuring the swiftness of the revolution of the earth upon its axis, from the sun-dial of old, to which Hezekiah referred, to the illuminated alarm watch which comes proposing to mark the hours and minutes so that they may be read in the darkness of the night. The watches and clocks are used in the home, shop, office, and place of employment to indicate the hours of toil, or rest, or worship. They ought to record a routine of duty well performed. The psalmist, after having described the swiftness of the passing years, encourages a careful reckoning of time and its devotion to the highest good.

So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. (Ps. 90 : 12.)

Passing of a Stage-Coach

Among the many institutions named after Sam Houston was a pretentious stage-coach which made its first run between Austin, Tex., and Brenham, in 1841, and continued on its perilous and benevolent journeys until the year 1873, when it was left in an alley in Austin, having been put out of commission by the railroad entering the place. The coach was drawn by six mules in good weather and eight in muddy weather. It carried the mail as well as passengers, and figured in many a fight and hold-up. Guards were always carried along with the coach in the early days, to prevent Indian attacks and hold-ups by bad men who wanted to rob the mail. The woodwork was decorated with holes that the bullets had made in these raids. After thirty-two years of active service and thirty-six years of resting in the back alley, the city authorities ordered its removal, and thus passed into the scrap heap this exponent of another generation and civilization.

The outer forms of industry and truth decay, but the principles they contain remain, weaving for themselves newer and more fitting garments. Enterprise, self-support, industry, civic virtue, charity, faith in God, devotion to the church, in Austin and everywhere remain, though the relics of the past may have become obsolete. Sam Houston, the old stage-coach, perished, but the spirit of the famous Texan, Sam Houston, like that of every true man and woman who served God or fellow-man in the community, is still living in the institutions and destiny of the city of Austin.

The world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever. (I. John 2 : 17.)

Industrial Teaching in Schools

Chancellor St. Clair McKelway delivered the annual address at the opening session of the Annual University Convocation in Albany, recently, emphasizing in clear and eloquent language the necessity of a larger industrial training in the public schools. He held that the problem of making a living was such a great one that practical knowledge of the trades should be more generally communicated. He claimed that the trades unions did not allow as large a number of boys to learn the trades as were willing to do so, and that the number of those receiving technical preparation for the various tasks of the artisan ought to be greatly enlarged, and that by such action good would come not only to the individual scholars and to the public, but also to the trades unions themselves. On this subject he said:

"There are many thousands, girls and boys, who leave our public schools early to adventure on trades or business. There is too little place in our public schools for manual or mental instruction or suggestion in the trades. If more of such instruction could be given, or if the preparation for such instruction outside of our schools could be improved within our schools, then preparatory education would mean more to many of our young pupils than it means now. I do not know that the trades unions would permit this to be done. I am convinced it would be to their interest to permit it, and that it would strengthen the hold which unionism would have upon the general community."

Dr. McKelway has touched upon one of the coming questions of the day, and we believe that the State Legislatures, the statesmen, the trades unions and the public generally will befriend a larger technical instruction in our public schools for those who desire to become artisans. A number of the reigning families of the world compel their princes to learn some trade, and practise it successfully as a preparation for the highest type of rulership. The better teaching of those who desire to toil with their hands will elevate the standard of personal sovereignty which every citizen in our free state enjoys. The fact that most of our successful business men began life as toilers with their hands would indicate the healthful relationship between a wise industrial training and earthly prosperity.

Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished, but he that gathereth by labor shall increase. (Prov. 13 : 11.)

The Sweet Little Lady of Dreamland

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Let me thank you for the sweet little figure on your calendar, just to hand. One can almost see her breathe, so natural is this little lady of "Dreamland." It was a happy thought, as are many of the pleasures offered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

CHAPTER THREE

THE STRAWBERRY HANDKERCHIEF

TWO days after this parting Virginia was sitting alone by the window of the living room, carefully backstitching the little tucks in some cambric ruffles for her father's wrists. She had been singing, and the music of her song still lingered in her face. Everything about her was beautiful. For the embrasure of the window held upon its shelves potted pansies and hyacinth bells, and amid their enthralling perfume and loveliness, sewing and singing, Virginia sat, a sweet welcome wonder of womanly grace and beauty.

Her rippling brown hair was combed backward from her wide brow, and kept in place by a comb of that golden amber which looks like solid sunshine. Finely arched eyebrows of a darker shade than her hair, and long dark eyelashes emphasized the soulful gray eyes they guarded. Her face was perfect in shape and exquisitely tinted; her form tall, slender and graceful in every movement; and surely some innate, unreasoning sense of fitness had made her select the dress which so charmingly clothed her. It was an Indian chintz of palest sea-green shade, over which were scattered white lotus flowers. It was laced across her bosom with narrow green ribbon over a white stomacher of Decca embroidery, the elbow sleeves being finished with ruffles of the same rich needlework. And the whole simple costume was illumined by the radiant, long chain of amber beads, which after encircling her throat fell in a strand of dazzling sunshine to her white belt.

Such a costume would not tempt the beauty of 1908, but the beauty of 1765 was well pleased with its foreign air and its distinct contrasts; and the passionate and impressionable Joris Artaveldt thought it enchanting when he saw it on the girl he adored. In his eyes Virginia that afternoon lacked nothing of perfection. The mystical land of India and the homeland of the Zuyder Zee were blended with her youth and loveliness. He had come in unexpectedly, and he thanked his good fortune that at last he had found Virginia alone.

"My father and mother," she said, "are gone to short-evening with the Beekmans. Their daughter Maria has come to visit them; it is her first visit since her marriage—she lives now in Kingston—every one who was at her wedding will call upon her—we are friends with the Beekmans—long friends."

She was full of happy confusion; she was talking, but hardly aware of what she said, and Joris was not listening to her words. All his soul was in his eyes, and she felt their influence and was trying to talk against it. Of course she failed. A sudden silence, a tremulous look of inquiry, and Joris was on his knees at her side.

"Virginia, you dear one! You soul of my soul!" and he clasped her hands as he spoke, and kissed them reverently.

"I love you, sweet! Oh, how I love you! You know it, you must have seen, you could not help feeling it. Speak to me one word—just one little word, Virginia!"

She looked troubled, yet there was a soft light in her eyes no one had ever before seen. But she withdrew her hands from his clasp, and said gently:

"Joris, rise. Not while you kneel will I listen to you. That is wrong. Sit by my side. We are equals."

Then he drew a chair close to her, he clasped her hand in his own, and his arm was ready to embrace her. But though she felt his near presence like a new life, she could not admit any previous knowledge of his affection. The idea of love was as yet on the horizon of her thoughts, her heart a virgin wilderness, little known even to herself. If Love had ventured into its mysterious outskirts, his presence had not been consciously revealed. In the society of Joris she had indeed been sensitive to those vague impressions through which one soul enters into relations with another soul; but these elusive experiences had only been entertained in the realm of reverie, where they had naturally resolved themselves into a dreamy somnambulism. But when Joris converted his love into words and actions, all that was indefinite and dubious was dispelled by the innate, unequivocal ardor of his wooing.

"In Joris' eyes, Virginia that afternoon lacked nothing of perfection"

At first the passionate impetuosity of his entreaties astonished, perhaps frightened her a little. She could hardly believe that she was loved "as the light of his eyes," that his "very dreams were hers," and he "constantly longed for her, hoped for her, delighted in the very thought of her." But as he pleaded, he drew her closer to him, his arm embraced, his cheek almost touched hers, and then the tide of a woman's love suddenly overflowed her heart. She raised her eyes one instant, and in that instant the soul of Joris sought and found her soul; their bodies leaned to each other in visible beauty and affection, and so it came, the little word that makes all fast, and the long, long kiss.

For a few moments Joris and Virginia did not speak. Love's wordless presence was perfect companionship. It burned like an ethereal lamp in their soul-illumined eyes, and all that was sweet and true shone in them; no cloud, no shadow, only a glow of soft, dark fire. It gave to the lily-like pallor of Virginia's skin a lovely blush; to her red lips a radiant smile, to her tall, slim figure a new grace. Her voice held a caress in its tones, and her low, musical laugh threw a splendor over all her charms. Joris had not dreamed she was so beautiful.

He gazed at her with wonder, quite unconscious that his own physical attractions had been greatly enhanced by that all-overish grace which comes with the domination of the spirit over mere flesh and muscle. Indeed it was to the fiery radiations of his love's interior transfiguration Virginia had yielded her own love; for, armed by his transcendent passion, she had found his pleading keen as his sword and more persuasive than his beauty. For a true lover is more than a lover; he has that divinity of look and touch which makes of the beloved one an unquestioning worshiper.

Just one hour of supreme joy followed this revelation of affection—an hour in which the lovers, dwelling in Paradise, remembered neither the past nor the future. So much grace of love was given them that they refused to shadow those heavenly moments with any fear or care for the future, although both knew that such considerations must come.

It was Arent that brought the restless flavor of daily life into their elysium. As the clock struck five he entered, and Virginia rose hastily to order the belated meal. Arent's face was troubled, and the gay sailor youth had the weary air of an anxious landsman beset with business cares and debts and duns.

"Thou, Joris?" he said. "I am glad to see thee."

"What news have you, Arent?"

"Ill news only. All day long I have been in the midst of bickerings. In every one's mind there is confusion; in every one's pocket the same. Into harbor came two ships from London to-day, and the merchants will not receive their cargoes until they know whether that Stamp Act robbery becomes a law or not. My own cargo, in part, must remain also on the Manhattan. At a standstill is business of all kinds; the quays and docks are full of idle men; the stores are empty, and the merchants standing on the sidewalk angrily discussing or quarreling about the situation. The blue sky, and the sunshine, and a little wind among the trees above such unhappiness seemed a mockery. I wish myself at sea; there is no Stamp Act there."

"There are storms at sea, Arent."

"A blustering wind can be managed, but a crowd of blustering men are beyond reasoning with. The Governor was snarling right and left, and getting more snubs than fair words. I pity the poor man. What about your race, Joris?"

"The race will come off; every one will be glad of it. A battle in prospect might interfere—nothing less would."

"And will you really ride Corisande?"

"No, my father objects. Jerry Laycock will ride her."

"That little monkey I saw exercising her yesterday?"

"The same."

"But he is a child, only a child; you can not trust him."

"Can't I? Jerry is the best rider in New York. A little monkey, I grant you that, but he is sib with any horse he sees. Corisande adores him. She will not rest nights unless he is in the next box. Most horses want company, but they are generally satisfied with a cat or a dog; Corisande will have nothing, and no one, but Jerry. When she is lonely she taps the dividing board of the stalls with her hoof, and Jerry goes to her. What they talk about is their secret, but it seems to interest both. If Jerry tells Corisande to win, she will win, or she will drop dead trying to do it. Come and see her win, Arent."

"Yes, unless there is a battle on hand."

Virginia was making tea as Arent made this promise, and the young men joined her at the table. "Will Lady Rose be at the race, Virginia? Have you seen her here to-day?" asked Arent.

"Since she left us, Arent, I have not seen her. It is strange. I suppose the Coldens object to her coming through the restless streets, but she is sure to be at the races—the Coldens also; no one misses a race."

Then Arent was silent. The quiet sense of a lost hope subdued him. He did not even notice or suspect the love drama enacting at his side. All day he had cherished the idea that he would find Rose with Virginia, and his disappointment was great. He could not rise above it, and he complained of being worried about business matters.

"I wish that my father would come home," he said petulantly; "how can a man go visiting when there is so much at stake? I wonder me at father."

"He will return very early," answered Virginia; and then she looked from the clock to Joris, and the young lover understood that he was to go away. But Virginia walked through the garden with him, and at the gate the sweet trouble of parting delayed them so long that Arent finally came to the door and called his sister.

"A wearisome good-night you gave Joris," he said. "I want to talk to you about Rose. Oh, Virginia, I love her so much! Does she care for me? Tell me what you think—the truth tell me, for uncertainty is limbo. Yes, or no. Say that."

"She thinks you very handsome, very good and clever; does love come that way?"

"Has she any lovers in England? You must know; girls tell each other such things."

"She never spoke of any; but, Arent, dear Arent, she belongs to the nobility. Her aunt is a duchess—how can you hope to win her?"

"What then has nobility to do with love? Love makes all lovers equal. Love is straight as a little child. I love you, and you love me,' that is what she would say, and she would not think of nobility, or of her aunt the duchess, no indeed!"

"But if you loved her, and she loved some one else, Arent?"

"I for her, and she for another! Oh, Virginia, mad love, mad love, that would be!"

He looked utterly wretched, and Virginia could not bear the despairing tone in his voice. Besides, on that blessed night she was herself too happy to believe in loss or disappointment. From her own store of hope and joy she gave lavishly to her brother. She lifted him out of doubt and despair, and promised him his heart's desire, if he was only courageous and truthful. For all this is in the power of a good sister. Her love is the true, true love, the healing love, the comforting love. And Arent kissed her thankfully, and went into the garden with the light of hope in his eyes, and the melody of a tender love song on his lips—

"I would approach, but dare not move;
Tell me, my heart, if this be love."

A few minutes afterwards the Captain and his wife returned home. It had been but a poor merrymaking at Beekman's—"the men were full of anxiety," said the Captain.

"They were cross and ill-tempered as they could be," corrected Madame. "Every one of them was ready with a new complaint. Discontented creatures! I say that plainly."

"Well, then, men of the English race are always black angry when they are looking forward to trouble, and only deadly fight can make them cheerful again. There it is!"

"So? I thank God, then, I have a Dutch husband, who can hope for the best till the worst comes, and then make the best of the worst."

"Joris Artaveldt was here," said Virginia, "and he thinks we shall have some war."

"Men think as they wish," answered the Captain. "Young Artaveldt enjoys tossing the sheath from his sword."

"Oh, father!"

"And if he does," answered Madame, "he is no worse than the rest. With men, war is always popular. They like to dress up, and think they are heroes because on some battlefield they have acted like the wild beasts. O wee! when men are tired of easy days, they will fight. Nothing will help."

"Joris will fight for a good cause, mother; he will not fight without one. He is brave, and wise also. Now I will go to bed. I like not this constant talk of war and quarreling. It is not good."

"Well, then, nothing but worry have we brought home. Keep it out of thine own room, dear one. Sleep well!"

It was a large room facing the river. The windows were open, and as it was lilac-tide the perfume of these lovely Persian exiles filled it. She put out her candle, for the full moon in the cloudless heaven shed over the sweet place an ethereal light. Then she went to an open window and stood looking into the sleeping garden. A border of white flowers threaded it like a dream. The sough of the wind in the trees, the murmur of the river, the heartbeat of the spring, responded to all the mysterious enchantments of her own youth and love. And as she mused on the new happiness that had come to her, she could hear her soul singing within her—then she sank upon her knees, and lifted her joyful face heavenward in adoration of that dear God whose name is Love, and who

. . . though vast and strange,
When with intellect we gaze,
Close to the heart steals in,
In a thousand tender ways.

Into this chamber of peace, with its open look over garden and river, Rose Harley came very early one morning a few days after the engagement of Joris and Virginia. Indeed, it was so early that Virginia was still busy about its arrangements.

Christmas Eve

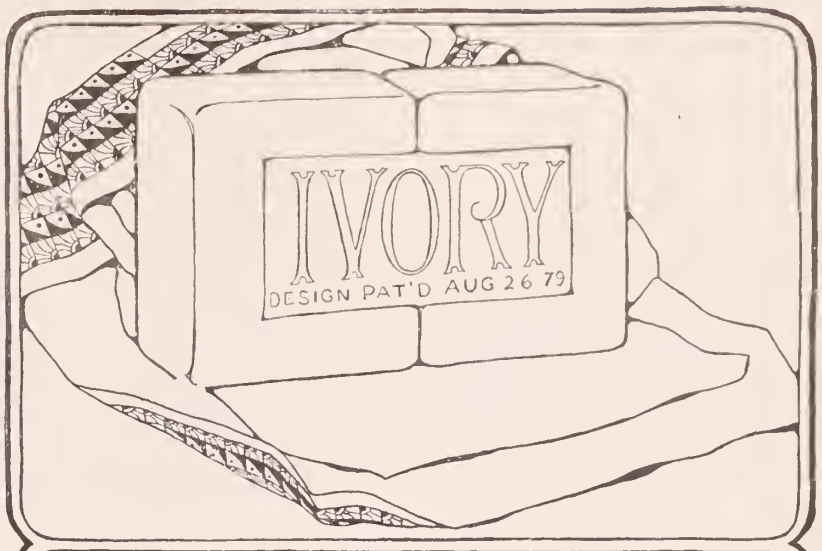
BY E. A. FERGERSON

CHRISTMAS Eve! And a blustery night—
Snow-flurries almost blinding the sight;
Eddying winds shift to and fro
And toss from the chimneys smoke-clouds low.

On the street is heard a noisy throng
Of pleasure-bent shoppers, hurrying along,
Laden with bundles and baskets and toys
To gladden the hearts of girls and boys.

Let the wintry winds moan on, and sigh
Through the forests, and sing their lullaby;
'Neath holly-wreathed branch and mistletoe
I rest and sleep while the tempests blow.

Christmas Eve! And the sound of bell,
Yuletide harmonies, break and swell,
And sing of a Babe in Bethlehem,
Born in a manger—Saviour of men!



It is pure!

That is the one thing about Ivory Soap that is of paramount importance.

It floats; it is free from that unpleasant odor which so many soaps have; it is available for use not only in the bath and toilet but also for fine laundry purposes—these things are important, but, after all, they are secondary to the one great fact that Ivory Soap is pure soap; and nothing else.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

Ivory Soap . . . 99 44/100 Per Cent. Pure.

The Reformer and the Redeemer*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AS John the Baptist is declared to be the Elijah of his time, it is appropriate to ask, first of all, Who and what was Elijah? And how was John the Baptist like him? And how different? And how were the sins John was called to rebuke like those of Elijah's time? And have not the same sins, in substance, come down to our time? And do we not need Elijahs and Johns? And who are our Elijahs and Johns? Are they those who bear their names to-day, whose parents in so naming them prayed they might be as faithful, if not as famous? As John with a different name was an Elijah in spirit (not in person, for Elijah appears at the Transfiguration in his own name, Matt. 17:3), are we, of different names, the Elijahs and Johns of to-day? And if not, why not?

It is worth while to consider whether we are Elijahs and Johns, for they rank very high with God, and should with all good men. When two men were selected from all the great and good who had gone to heaven before Christ came to be the ambassadors of God at the coronation of Jesus Christ, Moses and Elijah were chosen (Matt. 17), lawgiver and reformer, thus singled out as the two chief forerunners of Christ in the Old Testament; and another Elijah, another reformer, John the Baptist, who was to be the New Testament forerunner, Jesus declared was the greatest of men. The reformer is the forerunner of the Redeemer.

The Work of Elijah and John

That the work of Elijah and John the Baptist was, in both cases, preeminently that of moral reform there can be no doubt. The worship of Baal and Astarte, which it was Elijah's task to overthrow, was the "white slavery" of that time, labeled, like Mormonism, with the name of religion. Ahab and Jezebel were its champions, and Ahab's robbery of Naboth, and other abuses of civil power, called Elijah to other acts of civic reform. So John came to his death by condemning a divorce, that of Herod and Herodias, the Jezebel of the New Testament. And we see the keen cartoonist of civic reform in John when he pictures the enthroned politician of his period, that same Herod, as "that fox." Reformers were not popular with men in the days of Elijah, nor even in the days of John, though crowds came to hear his novel message; nor are they popular to-day, except with God. A lawyer presiding in Indianapolis, at a reformers' meeting, said: "Reform means change, and you are starting out to change men, and they do not wish to be changed. You have a hard job."

When the stonecutter changes the rough stone into a form of utility and beauty, the stone makes no objections; but when one seeks to reform men into clean, clear-headed, honest living they resist as if their hideous, unhealthful, wasteful sins were precious treasures, of which they would not be despoiled. Emerson says, in substance, "We don't like reformers, but they are everlastingly right." It must suffice the reformer that God likes him, and that men will later like his work and its results. How men hated the Puritans in their own time for objecting to making the Lord's Day the devil's day, and the Christmas season the most unchristian revel of the year! But the children of those who stoned them build statues of the Puritan as the father of emancipation. The head that is cut off for brave speaking in his own time is the painter's subject in succeeding ages.

Count von Moltke, the great German strategist, chose for his motto, "First weigh, then venture." It is to this he owed his great victories. He was slow, cautious, careful in planning, but bold, daring, even reckless, in execution, the moment his resolve was made.

Present Evils

The sins Elijah and John rebuked yet survive: white slavery, Mormonism, divorce, abuse of power, popular indifference to wrong. Read not only Matt. 3, but also Luke 3, to see what other sins John condemned. As severely as Elijah scored the Baalites for their hypocrisy in calling their lust religion and for worshiping images of wood and stone, John scored the Pharisees and Sadducees for their false pretenses in offering to God services as heartless as an image and for using their religion to cover up covetousness and hearts of hate and envy, that are to God as vipers' nests. But he also scored the publicans, the tax collectors, for such graft as has recently shown our New York Custom House to be a den of thieves; and the soldiers, for such police tricks of false accusation and extortion as are frequently uncovered in investigations of our large cities. In such cases there are usually good men, who know that wrong is being done, who are too cowardly to make it known lest they may lose place or popularity. One of the sins that preachers and parents and teachers should all make hideous from childhood is the sin of cowardice. There is no lack of courage when war or fire calls for it, but when "home protection" raises its banner against the worst foes of home and childhood the story of Gideon is repeated and only one per cent. even of God's main army, the church, goes to the "firing line," except when, by a great campaign, agitation rallies to the ballot-box for a day those who have for years camped about the band in the rear, singing "Onward, Christian Soldiers" to the thin skirmish line, far in advance. It would seem that we might grow a generation as brave in fighting moral evils as fire or war, if the church would set itself to honor, rather than dislike, those who "trouble Israel" only to purify it. No one can intelligently read the prophets and not see that religion is designed, not to "save souls" only, but to save the whole man and the whole community here and now.

Environment Affects Conversion

That is why and how the reformer prepares the way for the Redeemer. The reformers' work is to create a better moral environment, especially for the young; to remove the preventable perils of youth. When the Bible so often represents the work of the church as that of a farmer, it is surprising that it has been so seldom recognized that we must not only plant the seed of truth in the heart, and the heart in the church, but must also pull the weeds that are likely to choke the seed or dwarf the plant—the foul pictures, corrupt shows, saloons, street roving at night. The farmer that gave his whole care to planting seed, and gave no effort to create a favorable environment by plow and fertilizer, and fence and cultivator, and by weeding, would be more likely to go to the insane asylum than to the market. Said a thoughtful preacher: "We can never expect to have great revivals of abiding benefit in this age of cities till the churches give united effort to the task of creating a better moral environment." Said another: "We must save society, if only to make a safe place for saved souls." Sometimes

Elgin and Waltham Companies Announce Increases Following "Revision."
PRICE OF WATCHES ADVANCED.
Waltham, Mass., Sept. 20.—In conjunction with other Eastern watch manufacturere, the Waltham Watch Company to-day advanced the price of watches and cases. The advance is understood to average about 7 per cent. This action by the Eastern manufacturers follows an advance by leading Western manufacturers last week. The prevailing high price of materials is given as the reason for the increase.

This is to announce that the price of the high-grade Ingersoll-Trento and the low-priced Ingersoll watche have not advanced and will not.

Although our output is over 12,000 watche daily—more than four times that of any othe product—we did not join in the petitio presented jointly by practically every othe American watch factory asking for highe "protection" when the revision was unde consideration by the Ways and Means Con mittee of Congress.

Those factories got the higher tariff the asked for. Now they have raised their prices We ask no tariff favors. It costs us no mor to make watches than formerly, and we deer it business wisdom and fair play to the publi to adhere to the prices and the policy o delivering the utmost values possible whic have built up the stupendous sales ou watches now enjoy.

Our prices have always been publishe broadcast and marked on every watch box Others have no standard price, they sell a different prices in different stores so yo cannot estimate their recent increase.

In your own interest simply insist upon examining the new Ingersoll-Trento and comparing it in quality, appearance, and price with others. Many Jeweler display the "I-T" in their windows.

☞Our free booklet, "How to Judge a Watch," is a complete explanation o watch construction which every man who carries a watch should understand. Sen to our home office for it and also for list of local jewelers who sell the "I-T."

A New Idea in Watch Construction

A moderate-priced watch of high-price excellence

Here is a 7-jewel watch built, in essential particulars, as only highly jeweled watches have heretofore been built.

Its movement is of the bridge-model construction like the very best movements of the fine American makes. No other 7-jewel watch is made in this type.

The workmanship and finish of all the small reciprocating parts, so vital to accuracy and durability, are thorough and honest. It has a compensating balance wheel, scientifically designed to adjust itself automatically to changes of temperature. And a micrometric regulator permitting the most precise adjustment. It's an exceedingly close timer, good for 20 years of service with reasonable care. Money cannot buy a better looking watch. It is guaranteed. You can pay far more without getting so good a watch. It is a new value. For the vast majority of men and young men it is all that can be desired.

"California Now or Never!"

"The Kuhn California Project" will irrigate 250,000 acres in the famous Sacramento Valley. The land is ready! The water is ready! Are you ready? The sale of these rich valley lands has just begun in tracts of 10 to 80 acres. Small payment down; then ten annual payments.

The valley is garden soil, 50 feet deep, yielding immense crops of fruit, alfalfa, sugar beets and all the famous products of California. Mature orange groves on these lands have yielded as high as $1,000 per acre. If you are going to have a farm, why not have the best? The Kuhns are always looking for the best, and their experts tell them in this enterprise they have found it. They are putting millions of dollars into improvements to make it still better. The land is close to big markets and will pay for itself.

You take no chance in buying land under the Kuhn projects. The Kuhn interests are irrigating 400,000 acres in the Twin Falls Country, Idaho. Their great Sacramento Valley project offers a frostless winter and a still wider range of crops. Organize a California Colony in your own city or town. Take your neighbors with you.

There is in press a very choice book of 48 pages, "California—Now or Never." It is by far the handsomest California book ever issued, and will show you at a glance whether you want a home ranch in California. To insure a select distribution, it is priced at ten cents. All other publications which are fully descriptive are free. Fill out the coupon below and mail. If you want the new book, enclose ten cents for each copy.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

it is cowardice that says: "The only way to reform our city is to have a revival." It is often true that the only way to have a revival of abiding benefit is to precede or follow the personal revival with a civic revival—to prepare the way of the King of kings in our own hearts.

What Crooked Places Must Be Made Straight

What rough places must be made smooth? What high places must be brought low? What low places must be leveled up? What ax must be laid to what roots of what trees? The previous paragraphs have dealt mostly with the saving of society, a theme for older classes chiefly, that a tactful teacher may adapt to younger pupils. But let us now consider how the way of the King into the individual life can be prepared; how it can be made "easier to do right and harder to do wrong." Let no one think we can ever make it too easy while human nature is what it is, and the environment of this world is what it is even where the reformer has done his best. Madame Layyah Barakat, a Syrian, told the following story at the recent annual convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union:

"I remember once, as a little girl on the mountains of Lebanon, I heard there was a traveler coming, and that traveler was the Prince of Wales, who is to-day the King of England. And when the word came to the Governor that the prince was coming to visit Syria and the beautiful mountains of Lebanon, he had no way to send the news except by messenger. The way must be prepared for the coming of the prince, and the messenger was sent from town to town, from house to house, and when he reached a town he would find the highest place, the highest hilltop, and there he would cry out his message where all the people could hear him: 'The Prince of Wales is coming. You must all give service to prepare the road, to make the crooked places straight, and the rough places smooth, for the coming of the prince!'"

Thus the old prophets cried aloud for centuries—John the Baptist ending the series—that men should prepare for the Messiah King by cutting down their mountainous pride and leveling up their faithless self-distrust; by straightening out their crooked financial and industrial ways; by giving righteousness, that is, rightness, more attention than mere ritual. How they swung their axes against the highest trees to prepare the way of the King they promised should come!

A man once dreamed that he was swept into heaven, and he was there in the glory world, and oh, he was so delighted to think that he had at last made heaven. All at once one came to him and said, "Come, I want to show you something." And he took him to the battlements, and said, "Look down yonder; what do you see?"

"I see a very dark world."

"Look and see if you know it."

"Why, yes," he said, "that is the world I have come from."

"What do you see?"

"Why, men are blindfolded there, many are going over a precipice."

"Well, will you stay here and enjoy heaven, or will you go back to earth and spend a little longer time and tell those men about this world?"

He was a worker who had been discouraged like Elijah. He awoke from his sleep, and said: "I have never wished myself dead since."

From the sinners' own point of view, no preparation is needed for welcoming Christ, who will himself banish the darkness by bringing in the light, "overcome evil with good," displace the baser love with the higher love.

All the fitness he requireth
Is to know our need of him.

A Joyful Family Gathering

By Robert Stuart MacArthur*

IT was a bright, clear, cold Christmas morning as we hastened to the church service. It was not, as Milton said in his immortal "Ode to the Nativity," the "winter wild"; but it was the winter crisp, clear and cold. The service was attended simply by those who felt drawn to the house of God on Christmas morning. The sermon described the visit and gifts of the Magi, drawing lessons from their offerings of gold, frankincense and myrrh, laid at the feet of the infant Redeemer.

Early in the afternoon a visit was made to the home of one of God's choicest saints, a woman who had been bed-ridden for many years. Her home was humble, but it was radiant with the glory of God. The light of God was on her face and the peace of God was in her heart.

Then came a visit to a home of poverty, so far as a bank account was concerned, but rich with children, and with faith in God. She was a widow, with six little children. Two of the pastor's children accompanied him to this home. They carried numerous gifts of toys to the children of this widow. The toys were bestowed. Laughter echoed through the humble apartment, and somewhat of the unspeakable joy which the Christ-child has brought the world was experienced in that dwelling. The grocer and the butcher each had performed his part, in response to the pastor's orders, given on the previous day. Words of instruction and inspiration were spoken and prayer was offered.

Then came a glad family reunion. The table was bountiful and beautiful. Brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts and cousins, more than a score, sat at that table. Eleven colleges for men or women were represented in this family group. There was truly a feast of heart and soul at that table. Then came a little play, written by one of the family group. This play was a "take-off" on family characteristics, as represented at the table. Then followed recitations, each cousin being under obligations to contribute somewhat to the pleasure of the hour. College songs were intermingled with the other exercises. Then all joined hands and sang, raising their hands at certain parts of the song:

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And days o' lang syne?

*Pastor Calvary Baptist Church, New York.

A Christmas Lullaby

(See Cover Illustration)

OVER the tops of the listening trees,
Over the foam of the tossing seas,
Hark to a baby's cry!
Out of the ages it echoeth clear
So that whoever chooseth may hear,
Lullaby, lullaby!

For as that little one woke to weep
Down to the heart of creation, deep Thrilled the wild agony—
Came a sad vision of love and woe,
Making us wonder and bow us low—
Lullaby, lullaby!

And then from the sorrow there came release;
Then, my darling, came perfect peace
And down, from the depths of sky
Fell the angels' songs and the world was gay,
And we think of it all on Christmas Day,
Lullaby, lullaby!

AROUND THE CHRISTMAS TABLE

A Good Word for Santa Claus

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AMONG the readers of this page there are, no doubt, certain conscientious people who hesitate about letting their children believe in Santa Claus. They insist that there is no such person as the mythical saint, and that all the machinery of laden sleighs, prancing reindeer and swift descent down the chimney to fill waiting stockings is the merest trumpery of untruth. They therefore declare that from the outset they will let their children understand that it is silly to send letters to Santa Claus or to dream dreams of his kindness to the boys and girls.

Well, there is a good deal to be said in favor of always speaking the exact truth, but the question arises whether under the garb of myth and fable there is not a truthful suggestion that finds its way unerringly into the juvenile mind. At a very early age most children comprehend the poetry of Santa Claus. They know as an actual fact that father and mother buy their Christmas presents, and they are aware that they, as well as their parents, have a good deal of fun in playing at Santa Claus when their own little gifts are slipped into the toe of somebody's stocking. All the same, until they are nearly grown and often long after, they do believe in Santa Claus as a spirit of universal good will, a bringer of happiness and a beautiful and benignant presence during the holiday season.

Not to believe in Santa Claus is to lose something very sweet in childhood. For my part, I who write to you have never lost an iota of my faith in the dear old saint. I do not always think of him as a jolly figure, with a thatch of white hair, a snowy beard and a rubicund face, although I have long been familiar with him, as in such a guise he has genially appeared on the platform when a Sunday School has kept its Christmas anniversary in the middle of the holiday week. My Santa Claus is younger, stronger, more athletic and more allied to the woods and hills than is the old fellow who pretends to have come straight from the Arctic circle. He carries with him no end of gifts and messages to the children of poverty. The children of wealth are sure to be provided for when Christmas returns, but what about the little ones whose fathers are out of work or whose mothers are widowed, the little ones who know what cold means, who go without their breakfast to school, whose feet are ill-shod and whose raiment is tattered?

That Santa Claus usually adds to the comfort and gladness of these children, that he sends them fuel, food and warm clothing, as well as toys and dolls, cannot be denied by any fair-minded observer whose sympathies extend to the destitute. I am not afraid to say that there is no real infraction of truth in saying to a child, "You will receive a gift from Santa Claus that will help to make your Christmas happy." The child is quicker than you imagine to get at the heart of the pretty Christmas myth. I wish that the "trailing clouds of glory" that belonged to childhood in its earliest years were not so soon swept away by the ruthless touch of actual existence.

What Christmas Costs

THE seamy side of Christmas is not apparent until householders sit down and foot up the bills when the holiday is over. The temptation to spend more than we can afford is almost irresistible in the weeks that precede the holidays. One friend, looking over her list of kindred and acquaintances, said, with a glance of despair, "I don't know whom to omit, but there are seventy-five persons, older and younger, who will expect a remembrance from me this Christmas." The word expect should be eliminated from our Christmas vocabulary. It carries a suggestion of obligation, and the moment obligation enters into gift-making the quality of the act deteriorates. We should give only what we can afford, and should not permit ourselves to exceed the limits of the income, no matter how dearly we may care for our friends.

The children at home are satisfied with simple and inexpensive presents, unless they have been spoiled by surfeit and indulgence. A minister said in a sermon recently that he pitied the boy who had never had the pleasure of making a little cart and whose toys had all been bought and presented to him. A woman whose children have had many French dolls, with eyes that open and shut and real golden hair, declares that she has not seen in their faces the complete happiness that flushed her own when as a little girl she received from her mother a home-made doll, entirely the work of that mother's hands. It was a rag doll, and its face had been carefully painted by the mother's brush. It could neither cry nor do anything else that modern dolls do, but it went to bed with her at night and got up with her in the morning, and her cup of bliss ran over.

It is a pity to spoil Christmas by lavish extravagance that ties debt like a millstone around the neck of a hard-working father.

The Christmas Markets

A stroll through the markets just before Christmas gives a vivid impression of the way in which the country feeds the town. The turkeys that last summer stalked majestically over the fields, wandering in flocks after the manner of turkeys, were raised, poor things, for the groaning boards of hotels, boarding houses and innumerable separate homes, and their price has gone into the pocketbooks of those who raised them. They look almost as splendid in the market stalls, flanked by celery, cranberries, fruits from the tropics, and vegetables of a dozen varieties, as when they wore their white or brown plumage in the August sushine.

The amount of food required for a great city is beyond the estimation of the casual passerby, but a failure in crops or a lack of interest on the part of the individual cultivator, East or West, would mean famine in the town. We are all bound together in one bundle, and we cannot be independent one of another. Lines of communication by rapid transit bring the products of California, of Florida, of Louisiana, to the North and East; just as other lines of transit convey the productions of New England and the Middle West to the distant South. Swift ships traverse the ocean, freighted with articles for the table from Java and Ceylon, China, India and Japan. The Christmas markets are an object lesson in geography and a proof of the close international relationships which commerce brings us.

THE CHRISTMAS TREE

Oh, never a sight the children see
So fair as the shining Christmas tree;
And the keen sweet smell of its balsam wild
Gives a thrill of joy to every child.

And beautiful fruit its branches bear,
Fruit delightful that each may share;
And hark! on the swelling breezes still,
The song comes floating, "Peace! Good will!"

THE LOVING-CUP

'Tis the time of year for the loving-cup
To pass from hand to hand,
When the sounds of joy and revelry
Are echoing o'er the land.
For North, where the skater skims the mere,
And South, where the red-bird sings,
A pulse of cheer in the waning year
The merry Christmas brings.

'Tis the time of year for the open hand
And the tender heart and true,
When a rift of heaven has cleft the skies
And the saints are looking through.
The flames leap high where the hearth was drear,
And sorrowful eyes grow bright,
For a message dear that all may hear
Was borne on the Christmas night.

What Others Say

OF CHRISTIAN HERALD PREMIUMS

Mothers, Read This!

My Dear Mr. Klopsch: I have just looked over Before the Doctor Comes, and it has brought tears to my eyes and palpitation to my heart. This does not read like a testimonial, but it means more than I can tell you. My comfort, however, is that, in the future should there be occasion, my remaining children will get the benefit. May God bless and reward you for placing such a helpful book within the reach of your readers. May every mother add it to her treasures. J. W. C.

Yonkers, N. Y.

From a Delighted Subscriber

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The premiums given with my subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have arrived. I do not understand how you are able to give so much with the paper. Margaret Sangster's Story Bible is fine! What a book for 50 cents! The calendar, with that precious sleeping babe, is beautiful, and so is the "Dorcas" picture—an extra, which I did not expect. Wishing you all the blessings of Yuletide, I am very sincerely yours, MRS. S. B. WHITING.

Cambridge, Mass.

They Adore It

My Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your Hero Tales from American Life came last night. We are simply delighted with the book; in fact, we adore it. How you can furnish it at so slight a cost is a marvel. We cannot understand it, but no doubt you can. You always do things that seem impossible. M. M. K.

St. Louis, Mo.

Fulfils All Claims

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received the premiums you offered with your much-prized paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The book, Before the Doctor Comes, is all you have claimed for it, and more; am well pleased with it. The calendar is excellent, as well as "The Daughters of Dorcas," accompanying it, coming as a surprise. Many thanks and appreciations. MRS. W. T. MCKAIG.

Wilmington, Del.

Told in a Delightful Way

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Thank you very much for the two beautiful pictures you sent as premiums. They are the finest you have ever had. Am very much pleased, too, with the Story Bible. The stories are told in a delightful way. Wishing you God's blessing upon your work. F. L. M.

Buffalo, N. Y.

A Book that Thrills the Heart

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received many of your premium books in years past, but none have given me more genuine pleasure than Hero Tales from American Life. The stories are so full of action, vigor and brave deeds that they thrill the heart and make one proud of the flag and country. It should be in the hands of every American who wishes to be familiar with the heroes and heroines, both of our own day and of the past. It will be read again and again, for stories of real life, told so entertainingly, will never grow old.

Worcester, Mass. R. B. B.

They Are Both Beautiful

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I cannot tell how delighted we are with our calendar and the picture. They are both beautiful. It is simply a pleasure to look at them. I also wish to thank you for the kind wish for the year. I am so glad I belong to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. (MRS.) H. J. GENT.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Never Saw Anything so Real

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I write to thank you for the beautiful "Dreamland" calendar and the picture, "Daughters of Dorcas." I think they are both lovely, but I never saw anything look so real as the darling child asleep. I am sure they will give me great pleasure every time I look at them. I shall be glad to show them to my friends. May the Lord bless you and use you more and more for his glory is my earnest prayer. HELEN CLARK.

Bridgeport, Conn.

Better and Better All the Time

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I wish to express my thanks for the two beautiful pictures, "Dreamland" and "Daughters of Dorcas at a Labor of Love"; and also the three books, Hero Tales from American Life, The Story Bible and Before the Doctor Comes, which I have just received. I am more than delighted with them all. I think the "Dreamland" is perfectly lovely and so sweet. But I do love my dear CHRISTIAN HERALD the best of all papers. It is getting better and better all the time. I wish you continued success for many years to come. MISS M. P. BENEDICT.

Most Generous Gifts

Dear Dr. Klopsch: You certainly are one of the most generous men the Lord ever made. Thanks many and sincere for the exquisite "Dreamland" calendar. One almost hears the darling breathe! What perfect repose in every muscle! One feels like stepping lightly for fear of disturbing such peaceful sleep. How can I express my thanks for "Daughters of Dorcas"? It seemed too greedy to ask for that when the beautiful calendar and a premium were given with each renewal; nevertheless, it is fully appreciated, for I wanted it, but did not say so. Each face expresses a different thought while listening to the reading, and is most attractive. Gratefully yours, (MRS.) MARY BARTLETT KELLOGG.

Reads The Christian Herald at 80

Dear Christian Herald: I want to thank Dr. Klopsch very much for the pictures, which I think are very fine. The sleeping babe is just lovely. I take a good deal of pleasure in reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I want no other paper. I am over eighty years old, and alone, so I can all the more enjoy my paper. And I enjoy good health. God bless Dr. Klopsch, and all his co-wokers.

Sabula, Ia. MRS. SUSAN KELLEY.

Without an Equal

Dear Dr. Klopsch: For simplicity, purity and beauty, "Dreamland" has no equal. It is a perfect calendar. We are delighted with it; also with "The Daughters of Dorcas."

Norwood, O. MRS. J. HATTERSLEY.

Adds Pleasure Each Day of the Year

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Accept many, many thanks for the "Dreamland" calendar and the accompanying picture, "Daughters of Dorcas." In your gifts this year you certainly have outdone even yourself. I am delighted with them. They have already made me very happy, and will add to my pleasure each day of the year and always—"a thing of beauty is a joy forever." HARRIETTE E. ABBOTT.

Syracuse, N. Y.

Finest Calendar Ever Seen

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The calendar, that reached me two days ago, is the finest article of the kind I have ever received from any publication. In every respect it deserves high praise. The picture, "Daughters of Dorcas," is worthy to carry the best of Christmas wishes, and will be a welcome addition to the wall pictures in the room of a young girl I know of. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is, first, last and all the time, practical; and no practical person does what does not pay, either in dollars or delight. If, in this instance, the reward is in delight, there's no doubt about "the money's worth" of it heing had. And it's the pleasantest sort of a boomerang, for on our side "we subscribers" are delighted, I am very sure. MRS. F. BEADLESTONE.

Sees Heaven in Child's Face

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received the beautiful pictures sent by you. The "Dreamland" calendar is exquisite. The heavenly expression on the child's face makes me feel that I would like to stay there till he awoke, and I could put my arms about him. The "Dorcas" picture was a great surprise to me, as I had not heard about it. It is simply beautiful! I thank you more than I can express for the pictures, and the pleasant greeting. I would like much to shake hands with you. I enjoy THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so much, and I read it before Saturday so that I can give it to a friend, who calls every Saturday to see me. I wish you a very happy Christmas, which I know you will have, because you have made so many people happy. ELLEN A. CANFIELD.

Money-Saving Combinations

American Boy

Biggest, brightest and best magazine for boys in all the world. You need never worry about your boy's company when he is chumming with The American Boy. It is the greatest adjunct to refined home training. Wins every boy's confidence and enthusiasm. Bright, breezy stories of adventure, travel, history, biography and world events, beautifully illustrated. Proper amount of sports and games, and practical departments of photography, electricity, stamps, curios, carpentry, mechanics, how to do things, how to make things. Is doing more for the healthy entertainment and uplift of boys than any other single influence. Has the enthusiastic support of over 250,000 boys, and their parents. Give your boy a magazine of his own.

American Magazine

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is fortunate to be able to secure The American Magazine this year on the same special terms as in previous years, because its price has been raised to 15 cents a copy, and $1.50 a year.

This increase is necessary because of the addition of forty more pages of reading matter and pictures, making the magazine bigger, better, brighter, livelier, more joyous than ever. The three most important features appearing in any magazine this year are in The American Magazine: "What Woman Has Done in America," by Ida M. Tarbell, a historical series lavishly illustrated. "Simon, the Jester," a fascinating novel by William J. Locke, author of "Simple Septimus." "Barbarous Mexico," a startling series on slavery and other amazing conditions in Mexico, by J. K. Turner. Many other extraordinary features will appear in The American Magazine for 1910.

Cosmopolitan

Cosmopolitan Magazine is the one great magazine of all the great national monthlies. No matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1910 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by George Randolph Chester, or the intensely interesting adventure story by E. Phillips Oppenheim. "The best, no matter what it costs" is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

Good Housekeeping Magazine is a richly illustrated monthly, the one magazine which has popularized household science and home-making in a broad sense. It is the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest and most refreshing of periodicals for general reading, its fiction and discussions of current issues being particularly good. It is an all-around family magazine, which renders home-making a pleasure. How to secure the most and the best for the money in home furnishing and equipment, and in food supply, is among its specialties. Its greatly enlarged Household Experiment Station, Model Kitchen and Testing Room of household appliances is a national institution. Special attention is given to health, to children, to needlework, and stenciling.

Harper's Bazar

Beginning with the Christmas number of 1909, Harper's Bazar goes into its superb new, enlarged and improved form. It will be bigger than ever before. It will be better than ever before. It will be more interesting than ever before. It will be more helpful than ever before. It will be indispensable to every thoughtful woman whose ambition is to make the most of life for herself and for her family. It will "set the fashion." It will continue to be the supreme authority on questions of good form, household decoration, entertainment and domestic topics of every kind. It will have the best short stories, the best pictures, the best essays, the best poems found in any woman's magazine.

NOTE—The descriptive matter on this page concerning the above magazines is supplied by their respective publishers for the information of our readers.

For Home Reading or for Holiday Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A beautifully illustrated monthly magazine for children from three to thirteen. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and, above all, true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also playwork for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

Mr. S. S. McClure, editor of McClure's Magazine, is one of the greatest magazine editors in America and a man of national reputation. Speaking of McClure's Magazine, he said recently: "I shall continue to spend more and more money—to give my readers a better and better magazine. McClure's Magazine for the next year will be more intensely interesting, and will exert a more potent influence on American life than any other magazine. It will be the best twelve numbers of any magazine in America." McClure's is always a step in advance of other magazines. Besides the articles on government, politics, people and things, McClure's is also famous for its fiction. The coming numbers will make new history for McClure's. You'll want them surely.

Pearson's Magazine

One-half is for information on subjects in which you are interested; that means home subjects, the things that American people are thinking and talking about. Once in a while some foreign matter may be discussed, but only in its relation to Americans and only when it means something to America. During the coming year informative articles on subjects which mean something to the average man will be written, in every case by the writer best qualified for the matter. The other half of the magazine is for entertainment, purely and simply. Pearson's Magazine is famous in two hemispheres for its fiction. It gets the best that is written. There is a continual and urgent demand from the newspapers for Pearson's stories. Do you want this sort of a magazine?

Review of Reviews

Fifty Magazines Condensed—More Necessary Than Ever.

In a single number of The Review of Reviews there are sixty topics, every one of real, immediate interest to every intelligent man and woman, discussed and interpreted by Dr. Albert Shaw, his staff, and his contributors; there are one hundred pictures that really illustrate and inform, including the cartoon department, which amuses into the bargain; there are fifty magazines and leading articles skilfully condensed, and scores of the new books reviewed. "The Review of Reviews is a liberal education," is the way one eminent subscriber sums it up. The more things that happen—the more magazines there are—the more indispensable is The Review of Reviews. Busy men and women want it, need it, read it. Why not you?

Woman's Home Companion

The greater Woman's Home Companion will be the most interesting, the most useful and the most beautiful woman's magazine published. There will be fiction by Anna Katherine Green, Juliet Wilbur Tompkins, Anne Warner, Myra Kelly, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and a host of others. There will be special articles no woman will want to miss. With nearly a score of different practical departments for women Woman's Home Companion can promise the most useful woman's magazine in the world. In short, The Companion will have more stories than the fiction magazines, more pictures than the picture magazines, and more practical departments than any other magazine.

World Evangel

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are Sunday School teachers or scholars should not fail to include The World Evangel in their combination magazine orders. The Evangel is the leading Sunday School magazine. It makes teaching delightful and effective, its fund of anecdotes enabling the teacher to interest scholars of all grades. Its lesson study department provides the best available exposition and information, and its lesson-teaching department is divided into Adult, Intermediate and Primary Departments, including comment on Primary Graded Lessons. The Superintendent's Department is most practical. In addition to the lesson comment, by six specialists, it presents the most successful methods and news. The Evangel will save time and increase your efficiency.

World To-day (The)

The one magazine indispensable to every home. A world review, furnishing monthly not only a complete digest of events, but many attractive articles on timely subjects, by noted contributors. In it you will find events, religion, travel, science, invention, art, drama, literature, education, etc., treated in a popular way, affording recreation for the idle hour, and, best of all, something worth while. In illustration it is a regular panorama of the world—many of the pictures being in colors. The World To-Day is really a $3 magazine for but $1.50. It is clean, healthful and inspiring—just right for Christian readers. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain. It has proven one of our most popular publications, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

CHRISTMAS EVE IN BETHLEHEM

The Church of the Nativity, Where "Christ Was Born in Bethlehem"

THE large ancient Church of the Nativity, or Church of St. Mary, in Bethlehem, erected over the traditional birthplace of our Saviour, lies in the east part of the city, and is the joint property of the Greeks, Latins or Roman Catholics, Armenians and Copts. In the beautiful Latin Chapel, which is part of this historic pile, it was the privilege of the writer to hear the High Mass sung before the altar on Christmas Eve.

In attempting to write of it one wishes for adequate powers of description to be able to picture the scene presented to us on this Christmas Eve as it was, and as it impressed us as it was being enacted. If the walls of this centuries-old building, grand in its very simplicity, could speak, what tragedies they could unfold!

The low, narrow doorway, that a twelve-year-old child must stoop to enter; the great, dark, gloomy interior, lighted by only a few candles in glass cases hung around the walls, where one saw the outlines of human forms as through a thick mist or fog; the brilliantly lighted space before the high altar, where stood together sixty or more priests and bishops, in robes of gorgeous gold embroidery on heavy white satin, equaling if not surpassing those on exhibition in the museums of Europe—all these left an indelible impression on one's mind.

On this occasion a cardinal from Rome assisted in the service, his hat of red making a striking contrast to the white and gold of the bishops' robes.

The music was fairly good, though we scarcely heard it in our absorbing interest in the scene before us—constant robing and disrobing, changing from golden mitre to gold embroidered cap, the continual moving from bishop's throne to altar, all done with ponderous solemnity and with a grace of movement possible only by long practice and constant training. It all has its purpose no doubt, taught by the experience of years, and to the initiate each movement is a lesson covering some mystery hidden from those outside the "elect." It is most impressive.

It affects alike those who believe and those who scoff, and as the solemn ceremony moves on toward its conclusion its effects are apparent in the changed expression of many in the audience from indifference to spiritual exaltation and religious fervor that could only be brought about by the anticipation of heavenly joy.

But the most interesting of all to the writer was the sight of the Bethlehem women, with their high headdresses covered with their long, ornately embroidered veils, seated in Turkish fashion on the floor in front of the altar. On the upturned faces of some of them was an expression, almost Madonna-like, that might well serve as an inspiration for a Raphael or a Murillo.

The French consul, who holds a rather unique position in that the Latin, or Catholic, Church is under French protection instead of Turkish, as are the other Catholic bodies in Turkey, was present with his family, with a number of consuls of other nationalities as his guests. Much honor and attention were shown him during the evening. A priest in golden robes swung the censer over him, the consul standing reverently with bowed head to receive it, while an acolyte swung it over the kneeling laity.

At the close of the service the priests and the consul and his guests were given lighted wax candles, each one about three feet long and two inches in diameter. They then formed in procession, led by a bishop carrying a wax figure representing the infant Christ, and marched to the manger in the crypt.

Reaching the crypt, they laid the figure down with much ceremony and many prayers. This rather childish performance, it must be admitted, detracted somewhat from the grand solemnity of the evening.

This ended the midnight service, and as it was well on toward three o'clock in the morning we hastily sought our carriages and returned to Jerusalem, feeling that we had been greatly privileged to spend Christmas Eve in Bethlehem and amid scenes that carried us back to that glorious day when, amid the songs of the angels, the Saviour was born into the world.

WHY EDUCATED WOMEN DO NOT MARRY

NOT long ago a party of young people were gathered informally, and in the pauses of the entertainment they talked here and there, by twos and threes.

It chanced that two young men were left standing together beside the refreshment table, and became so much interested in conversation that they did not notice their environment. Thus some of their remarks were innocently overheard.

"I thought you were in love with Edna last year," one said to the other. "We all thought so. But suddenly you seemed to break off."

"Yes," the other admitted, hesitatingly. "I don't mind telling you that I like Edna, and she always seems to like me well enough. But I should never in the world think of marrying her."

"Why not—pretty, dresses well, good as gold, bright and witty, never spiteful—what is the matter with Edna?"

"Oh, nothing, only she knows such a lot. I'm never going to marry anybody who knows more than I do."

Now this is a literally true story, and the young man who made this singular speech is himself a college graduate.

In fact, there is no doubt that among a very large contingent of "nice" young men, even those who are what we call "educated," this feeling exists. They are mortally afraid of marrying girls who may seem to the outside world to be their superiors.

It has not yet dawned upon any beyond a very small fraction of our population that every home has two equal monarchs, the father and the mother, and that their power should be the same. When a hard question arises, they are to consult together in frankness and sympathy; and then the course is to be taken which, on the whole, seems wisest to both. In point of fact, there are thousands of such homes to-day, but they do not "get into the papers." The kinds that do are likely to be very different.

The old and now outworn creed was that a household must have a single head; and that, of course, a lordly man.

These young fellows who are so fearful of our learned girls probably belong to the class who wish to be the heads of their households, and to have no presumptuous "female persons" sharing their honors. And yet some of them have been brought up in model families—families in which husband and wife treated each other nobly and lovingly, ever preferring one above the other, and never claiming preeminence.

Among the friends of all of us we find scores of charming unmarried women, between the ages of twenty-five and forty. There are many who are highly unattractive—some so odd and eccentric that it would be hard to imagine a man who could become enamored of them; others, merely plain, dull, uninteresting.

However, between friends it may be whispered, we have all similarly known married women who excelled the oddest and out-heroded the homeliest.

The real wonder arises when we gaze upon serried ranks of lovely and lovable old maids, such as are described in a recent issue of The Independent. When so many ordinary women seem to find husbands without trouble, why are these blessed creatures without them?

Do they wish to marry?

Of course they do. They may say they don't. What would you say in their place? You, too, would declare that the grapes are sour; but the abstract "no" would yield readily to a concrete "yes," once Prince Charming should come.

Another reason why they do not marry is because they are too proud to adopt the strenuous arts of the determined huntress. They can support themselves, they are not in starving need of a home, and they would rather die than cast languishing eyes upon a man, no matter how much they might love him. They hold their affections within an iron leash; but their hearts know the same hunger that their sisters have ever known for husband, home and children.

There is not much use in trying to change our grown-up men. Let the mothers bring up their boys with the right ideals. Point out to them some household over which a foolish creature presides—her children ill-trained, her home unattractive—and contrast it with one in which a cultivated mother preserves sweet order and manages her family perfectly. The object-lesson, with line upon line and precept upon precept, should effect a change for the next generation.

Many of our college women marry. When married, they stay married, and their children are uncommonly healthy. These facts are well known. Therefore one might think that the "old maids" would be entirely in the uncultured classes, and that every one of the highly developed college women would be "snapped up" at once by eager wife-hunters. But it is not so.

The educated woman of America is not marrying so freely as for the good of her nation she ought to.

And it is not her fault. She wants a husband and a home. She would make them happy. It is only the tentative husband who spoils the beautiful idyl. He simply will not propose.

THE FOOD-TONIC

Universal endorsement of Sanatogen is accorded by famous physicians, authors, clergymen and other notables—of which the views of the Ven. Archdeacon Sinclair ably express the general sentiment. Sanatogen is composed of Albumen—milk's nutritive element — and Sodium Glycero-phosphate — the wonderful nerve and brain revitalizer.

Physicians the world over prescribe it in their daily practice and unreservedly endorse it as the logical food tonic.

We want to send to you with our compliments a copy of Dr. C. W. Saleeby's book "The Will To Do." It says some surprising things. It tells, for instance, how the nervous system has a controlling influence over your life in many ways you probably never thought of before. Fill in the coupon.

How to Concentrate*

SOMETHING in life must come first. There must be some one thing on which each individual lavishes the most of his time, love, thought.

We in America are accused of putting our business first. It is said by foreigners that the ardor with which we attack our daily occupation is unmatched by that of any other people. We are called "a Christian nation," as though our Christianity were our distinguishing characteristic. It is said of us that we ought to be called the "market nation," since buying and selling chiefly occupy our thoughts, and money is worshiped far more generally than is the God of our fathers.

The reproach of Ruskin in The Crown of Wild Olive, in which he heaps scorn and contempt upon his country for its arrant commercialism, is now even more fully deserved, it is to be feared, by our own America.

Others accuse our men of too utter a devotion to their wives and families. It is said that they slave themselves to death, in order to keep those that they love in refined idleness.

Few attribute to us the putting first of the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and yet there is no hope of permanent greatness for any nation until that kingdom and that righteousness are made its foremost and absorbing concern.

Dr. Albert J. Lyman, that noblest of our optimists, finds "unmistakable signs" that the nineteenth century was far more "Christ's century" than any which preceded it. He continues: "We are on the verge of yet more signal exhibitions of the divine power. The twentieth century is to be, I believe, even more evidently than the nineteenth, Christ's century. The critical era is to be succeeded by the constructive. The sectarian is to give way before the fraternal."

We must have faith that this is so; and that America, which bids fair to lead the world in wealth, education and even in art, ere this twentieth century ends is to be above every other the country of Christ.

In order to accomplish this grand object every individual must devote himself, with entire concentration, to the service of Christ.

This does not mean that he is to neglect his business or his family. In the great service all lesser services are fully included. There is an old love poem in which this idea is finely expressed. The lover sings to his sweetheart, "I could not love thee, dear, so much, loved I not honor more."

The love of the great perfections makes all other right loves purer, finer, deeper. The love of the Highest includes and glorifies all other loves. To put Christ's cause foremost in the heart means simply that before a man takes any step in business or in social life he says to himself, "Is this pleasing to God? Is this in the line of his commandments?"

When a growing majority of the men of any nation ask these questions, thus indicating that God is foremost in their thoughts, then and then only can that nation be truly called Christian.

"Religion," said that profound thinker, Francis Bacon, "is the chief bond of human society." Our greatest American university had as its first motto, "Christ and the Church." Let every Christian realize that until he recognizes in the same way the primary and paramount nature of religion and its source, and until he makes it the first and guiding principle of his life, he is not truly a Christian.

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, January 2. TEXTS: Phil. 3:13; Eccl. 9:10.

A Year With God*

GENERALLY the true spirituality comes to the human heart only with age and experience. It is only occasionally that we meet with a young person born with the faith which some of us have to achieve through long and bitter struggles.

The year which lies before us doubtless contains some measure of sorrow, as well as of joy, for each one; but it is worse than useless, and even ignoble, for us to shiver and cringe before possible future suffering. The daily readings for this week mark out fully the path for the Christian to pursue. If we help those about us to bear their troubles; if we do our daily work as unto God, "from the heart"; if we resolve anew daily that as for us and ours we will serve the Lord; if we forsake not the assembling of ourselves together, thus gaining and imparting the strength which comes by associating with those who share our beliefs; if we study to keep the Lord's law, then let the arrows of affliction pierce us as they may. God will be our pillar of cloud by day and fire by night, and will provide a balm for every wound.

The great writings, not only of Scripture, but of all literature, are full of testimonials to the value of hard trials. Not long ago in this column was quoted Browning's wonderful pæan of gratitude for "each kindly wrench that wrung from life's tree its fullest virtue." How many of the most precious hymns are full of the same spirit!

Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
When others fought to win the prize
And sailed through bloody seas?

This is only one stanza of a great array of similar and beloved hymns. Cardinal Newman sang of the "encircling gloom," when the night was dark and he was far from home. Baring-Gould likened the Christian life to a war in which we are all soldiers. Everywhere is recognized the necessity of the furnace, if we would be purified.

But how few are these figures in our grand hymnology compared with those which voice the joy and triumph of the Christian! Flame and sword are nothing if Christ is near.

There is one resolve which every Endeavorer should make anew each year. It is in relation to his conduct in his home. All of us know that the outside life of every one of us is not the chief source of happiness. That abides in the home or else it abides nowhere. You may fail in your business; you may be slighted in society; but if you have the love and confidence of dear ones at home the rest does not matter, you will be happy.

You can get this love and confidence only by giving them in return. This does not mean merely saying that you love and trust. It means forbearance, when fault-finding or sharp retorts spring to your lips. It means constant and oft-expressed appreciation of the kindness there. If your father or mother, or both, are plain and homely in their ways, while you have been educated above them, true filial love will make you still as affectionate and good to them as though they had elegant and cultured manners. If you would have a happy home, make the old people in it happy, no matter how crabbed or unjust or repulsive they may be. Try your best to get all defects remedied. If you cannot succeed, still live down every bit of criticism and opposition by your Christian behavior. It can almost always be done by prayer and hard work.

Let this be your New Year motto: "I will do all I can this year to make my home happy."

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, January 2. TEXTS: Num. 9:15-23; 10:10.

THEIR FIRST CHRISTMAS

By ADELINE TESKEY

OUT in the great West of a country where in by-gone days the wild buffalo herded in hundreds, where the moose and the caribou roamed unmolested, and the gopher and prairie dog burrowed in the soft black mould which now constitutes the richest wheat fields of the world, is situated a village. In the heart of this village, one winter afternoon, were congregated a number of children, with superintendent and teachers, for it was Sunday and the little assembly were holding a Sunday School.

Quaint, picturesque little bodies the children were, representatives of more than one nationality, that had sought a home in the new country. The girls wore red bandana handkerchiefs tied over their heads; and many of both boys and girls wore coats of sheepskin, with the wool side turned in. The signs of poverty were evident: toes almost peeping from strangely bandaged feet, and, in the case of boys, bare spots about the knees. But there they stood, little sheepskin-clad creatures, evidently enjoying the hymn which, in broken English, they were singing. The wind outside was playing some strange pranks, picking up the snow in great sheets and throwing it into white hillocks, covering the low shrubs and the very sleigh-tracks, whistling and shrieking down the chimney and through every seam and crevice in the small schoolhouse; but the company inside, made warm for the time by the great iron stove, which stood glowing and rosy in the middle of the room, were happy, as children ought to be.

They just had begun to sing—they were practising for the Christmas exercises:

> Hosanna! then our song shall be,

when a loud, clear rap resounded on the door. A small hand, belonging to a sheepskin-clad boy, was shot up into the air and a piping voice said:

"P'ease, super'tendent, me ope' door?"

Permission being given, the small lad hastened to perform the duty, as fast as his curiously wrapped feet would allow. The door was opened, and, along with a sweep of cold wind and a flurry of snow, there walked in a gentleman from a city twenty miles distant. He had been delayed in the village over Sunday, owing to a snow blockade of the train, and thought to shorten the long, dull Sunday by going in to see the "curious foreign Sunday School," about which he had heard.

After the superintendent had shaken hands with him, the stranger took off a fur-lined coat and shook the icy particles from the rich otter collar, hung up on a wooden peg behind the door fur gauntlets and cap, and seated himself to watch proceedings.

When they had duly regarded the stranger, whose furry garments had reminded them of many little animals which they had seen scurrying over the prairies, the children continued with the song:

> Hosanna! then our song shall be,
> Hosanna to our King!
> This is the children's jubilee;
> Let all the children sing.

A curious, puzzled look was on the little faces; they did not understand clearly what they were singing about.

"Hosanna is a big word," explained the superintendent, "it means praises to God. All the children—all the children in every country of this big world—ought to sing Hosanna at the Christmas time." But the little foreign faces looked stolid and uncomprehending.

"If we could only impress on these foreign children the meaning of Christmas!" said the superintendent to the stranger at the close of the school; "it seems so hard to do so. They are slow of comprehension, and have never before observed Christmas."

The stranger left the village on Monday morning, the snowplow having done its work on the railway, but he carried away with him one expression of the superintendent: "If we could only impress on these foreign children the meaning of Christmas!" He thought about it all week, and the following Sunday visited a Sunday School in his own church, which was known by the impressive title "Trinity Sunday School," and told about the little foreign Sunday School, twenty miles away, that did not understand the meaning of Christmas.

"Boys and girls," said the great man to the company of well-dressed young people, with whom he felt at home, "suppose we teach them the meaning of Christmas. Suppose, instead of having a tree on which we put presents for each other on Christmas Eve, we this year each bring, and put on our tree, presents for that little school of foreigners."

Trinity school was enthusiastic over the idea, and straightway the speaker began to inform them about the garments with holes, and the total lack, in many cases, of shoes among the little sheepskin-clad children.

There was a great time Christmas Eve, which occurred some two weeks later, in the Trinity Sunday School room. The pupils came, panting and out of breath, carrying large parcels, containing shoes, coats, hoods, mittens, while they were careful not to forget dolls, sleds and candy. Their faces were rosy and beaming, and one felt sure they were fully realizing that it is more blessed to give than to receive.

In the meantime, some one had secretly procured from the village of foreigners the names of all the boys and girls who attended the Sunday School, and the parcels were duly tagged and made ready.

On Christmas afternoon a driver was sent with a great sleigh-load of presents down to the little foreign settlement. It was planned that he should arrive about dusk, which occurred quite early on a winter's evening.

When the sleigh arrived at the door of the small schoolhouse it was found, as had been expected, that the superintendent was there, preparing for a Christmas night entertainment. A small tree was set up on the platform, decorated with strings of popcorn and some home-made taffy—it was all they could afford. The good man was almost overpowered when he learned about the presents for his school. A larger tree was procured at once, on which the newly-arrived articles were hung in profusion.

Christmas night was one of the most beautiful the West had ever known. The moon was full, and the stars from out the blue-black sky shone resplendent. The little hardened snowflakes and icicles glistened like so many diamonds under the moon's rays; all the world seemed to be putting on a gala dress for the entertainment in the foreign settlement.

At the appointed hour the pupils and their parents began to come, and

Mortgage Bonds and Certificates

IN our last financial article we advised your consideration of bonds, or other certificates, issued by a house of unimpeachable integrity. The words "other certificates" were used because there are many varieties of bonds—mortgage, municipal, railroad, irrigation, insurance, etc.—and for some of the modern securities certificate is the better descriptive term. We shall consider them all at one time or another, and endeavor to convey the principles upon which the value of each class is based. First, let us look into the mortgage bond, or certificate.

The mortgage bond is one of the oldest forms of the modern certificate, and, considering its history, one of the most stable. It is the guarantee of some duly authorized company, which bases its ability to pay back the principal and interest of money borrowed on its ownership of high-class mortgages. The idea, as far as the guaranteeing company is concerned, is comparatively new in this country, hardly a generation old in fact, but in Europe it dates back to the days of Frederick the Great. During the Seven Years' War the province of Silesia was laid waste, and when peace was proclaimed the demand for money was very urgent, interest rates rising above ten per cent. The land-owning nobles organized an association, "Die Schlesische Landschaft," the principles of operation of which were in effect the same as those of present-day companies.

European Mortgage Companies

The movement gradually extended all over Europe—France, Belgium, Austria, Italy, etc.—and it flourished so well that often during periods of warfare the credit of the various companies was higher than that of the nation. For instance, the bonds of the Credit Foncier, founded in France in 1852, were held at a higher rate during the Franco-Prussian troubles than the French government securities themselves.

The record in Germany has been particularly good. There are thirty-five companies in the empire, and since the days of the great Frederick there have been but two failures, and even in these cases not a bondholder suffered loss. This record is due less probably to the well-known honesty of the German character than to the principle of organization of the companies, which are formed with their borrowers as members and with each member responsible for any loss of the association through bad loans.

The need of such companies has long been felt in the United States. Our industrial progress has been one long succession of construction and reconstruction, with resulting waves of inflation and depression of values. Valuable properties of the one decade become worthless encumbrances of the next, and vice versa. Fortunes have been made in the process, but so also have losses been sustained.

Facilities of Large Companies

None but the expert judge of real estate values, with unlimited facilities for research, can hope to succeed for long in this business of estimating mortgages, and this ideal combination is best illustrated in those companies of which there are a number in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, and other cities, which have followed the European plan of lending money on mortgages and issuing bonds to investors, large or small, who wish to reap part of the interest to be made.

The perfect organization of these companies for research and the necessarily conservative character of each loan enables them to guarantee the value of each mortgage, binding themselves to pay any loss sustained by an investor. The safety of the process has also attracted a large volume of business and the arrangement and guaranteeing of mortgages to the extent of one million dollars a week is not uncommon for any one of these concerns. True, the interest paid is small, but that is one of the rules of financial transactions—the smaller the risk, the smaller the profit.

Mortgages are, for the most part, allowed on properties only in leading cities, and as the sums in question are generally large most of these companies issue bonds, which may be the promise of the company itself to pay back principal and interest on a certain date, or which may be secured directly by individual mortgages. Some of these companies issue certificates calling for an investment of a small amount, whereby the investor makes one of a syndicate whose money, in one large sum, is invested in a guaranteed mortgage. Of course, it all comes down to a consideration of the reliability of the company making the guarantee and issuing the certificate or bond.

Mortgages on Instalments

In order to accommodate the man of small but progressive means, several of the companies have divided their certificates into a definite number of parts, each of which is to be paid for by the month. A $200 bond, for instance, would be purchased in twenty instalments, and would draw interest annually until the date of redemption. The plan has one very good feature in that the principal may not be withdrawn, except in case of death, before the date of redemption, and this is a saving clause for most people.

It is hard to save money unless there is some direct object in view. There are, perhaps, a few people who are able to save money for the pure pleasure of saving it, but the average individual must have some very attractive object in view to prevent his spending his money for the numerous pleasant things that attract him day by day. Children put money in their small banks in the morning, and quite frequently shake it out the same afternoon to spend it for the toy of the hour. Men and women, too, are children of a larger growth. They may not find it so hard to save money, especially in small quantities, but the difficulty is to make it stay saved. Some savings plan that arranges to receive money, but provides no plan for paying it out, except at proper periods, is the kind of a plan that most people need.

Final Advantages

This condition would seem to be encompassed in the mortgage bond. There are three arguments of safety for it. In the first place, the security is something which cannot melt away. Even San Francisco land remains stable in its values in spite of a devastating earthquake. If the mortgage is guaranteed, the company behind the guarantee can be held liable, and the bond of such a company is its written acknowledgment of the fact. Furthermore, in such transactions, the investor is freed of all the worries attendant on delinquencies of payment. You get your interest whether the company collects from the land owner or not, and your principal also when the mortgage has matured. Some of the companies do not guarantee the payment of the principal on the very day of maturity unless it happens that the mortgage loan be promptly paid. They reserve the right to retain the principal until the loan has been paid, but in any case not longer than eighteen months after the date of maturity. This, however, is merely a safety proviso, much like that exacted by a savings bank when it insists upon having timely notice of cash withdrawals, and the privilege is very seldom exercised.

John the Forerunner

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE preparation for the coming and ministry of the Messiah was the preaching of John the Baptist. He was not Elijah, but he came in the same spirit and the same power. Like him, he was a man of the desert; he blew the trumpet of repentance like Elijah; he rebuked King Herod, as Elijah had rebuked King Ahab; he brought the multitudes to decision in Bethabara beyond Jordan, as Elijah did on Mount Carmel. His one message was, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," as Elijah's had been, "Why halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him."

But John was only an instrument, and yet nothing at all, except as he was held and used by Him who sent him. And he who held the instrument wrought upon the people, too. Without any pressure from man, without any advertising—under a power which must have been as directly from God as that wonderful gathering of the children of Israel by bringing Ahab under orders from Elijah—there "came out unto him Jerusalem and all Judea." God sent the preacher, God brought the audience. It was God, also, who sent the message.

John preached "as it is written in the book of the words of Isaiah, the prophet, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." The wrong things on earth can never be set right until "a King, the King of the Jews, shall reign in righteousness." Had the Jews then received their Messiah, this kingdom of heaven upon earth would then have been set up. It was at hand, but the rulers and the Pharisees, by their own testimony, did not believe on him, for they asked the question, "Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him?" And the chief priests were perhaps the foremost in denying him; so that the kingdom of Christ on earth had to be postponed.

John saw "many of these Pharisees, and of the Sadducees also, come to his baptism"; but he saw beneath the surface that, though they seemed to swim with the tide, their hearts were not right before God. And this preacher of repentance did not mince matters in dealing with these leaders of the people. John's mission was to bring men to decision, to an instant, definite break with sin, and to a real and living union with God.

Who told this man of the desert what were the sins of the divers classes of the people? He who "doeth nothing but that He revealeth his secret to his servants, the prophets." John was a man filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb, and he knew the language of the Holy Spirit. No wonder, then, that under his ministry there was this move among the people, which God wrought by it, and that "the people were in expectation [or suspense], and all men mused in their hearts of John whether he were the Christ or not."

continued coming until the small schoolroom was crowded. They gazed with wonder bordering on awe at the heavily-laden tree, all lighted with Chinese lanterns, not knowing what it meant.

There was singing. Then Santa Claus came in through some back door, all dressed in furs.

The foreign children began to rise to their feet, the look on their faces growing more strangely inquisitive. But as Santa called out the names written on the tags—strange, long names, with many crooked syllables—and presented the articles, giving a doll and a pair of shoes or a dress to a girl, and a sled with a pair of boots or trousers to a boy, dull little uncomprehending eyes began to shine, and the interest grew keen.

When the tree was almost unladen some faces began to grow uneasy. One large, red-headed Russian boy, leaning against the rear wall of the schoolhouse, became restless, standing first upon one foot and then upon the other; he was going to be forgotten, for sure. But suddenly a name of many syllables, with sounds of y and k about it, was called; the dull face expanded into a smile, and the young Slav lumbered forward to get his reminder of Christmas.

When the tree was cleared, Santa Claus, who was really the superintendent dressed in a "buffalo coat," sprinkled over with something white and glistening to look like snow, addressed the children, telling them that the boys and girls in the school twenty miles away had sent them the presents to remind them of God's great gift to the world of Jesus Christ.

Bright little earnest eyes, and older eyes in which glistened tears, were showing that the foreigners were comprehending, for the first time, the meaning of Christmas.

"Children, let us sing," said Santa Claus, and they burst out into:

Hosanna! then our song shall be
Hosanna to our King!
This is the children's jubilee;
Let all the children sing.

When the song was ended a small hand was shot up, and the same piping voice that had asked permission to open the door for the stranger some weeks before, a voice that evidently promised to be a leader among its owner's people in the years to come, called out:

"Please, Miste' Super'tendent, me know now de meaning of Hosanna! It mean praises to God."

The rich man from Trinity Church, who had run down on a late train to witness the little event of which he had been the instigator, thought as he was returning home at a late hour that he, too, knew the meaning of Hosanna as never before. And the following Sunday, when he told the whole story to the Trinity Sunday School, they all stood to their feet and sang:

Hosanna! then our song shall be,
Hosanna to our King!
This is the children's jubilee;
Let all the children sing.

The Korean Alphabet

In educational work in Korea one of the greatest difficulties is the lack of text-books in the native language. The Korean alphabet has twenty-five letters—eleven vowels and fourteen consonants. These letters are "made with easy strokes, in which straight lines, circles, and dots or whirls only are used," and it is "the simplest of all alphabets." Korea is the only one of the countries of the East that has an alphabet.

Farm Lien Securities

Interest, 6%

Among all the bonds that we handle, there are none so attractive to men who know, as Irrigation bonds.

These are among the reasons:

Irrigation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America.

The liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. The water immediately multiplies the land's value. The first crop from the land will usually pay the whole lien, and sometimes by several times over.

The liens are conservative. Bonds are rarely issued to more than one-fourth the land's value.

The liens are paid off in annual installments, so the indebtedness constantly decreases.

The bonds are additionally secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns. So we have a corporation, with large interests at stake, to guard against any delinquencies.

Some Are Municipal

Some Irrigation bonds are issued by organized districts, the same as School bonds. Such bonds form a tax lien on all the taxable property in the community. They form a high grade of municipal security.

Other Irrigation bonds are issued under the "Carey Act." Such projects, until they are completed and turned over to settlers, are under the constant supervision of the State Engineer and State Land Board.

Behind every Irrigation bond that we handle there is ample and ideal security.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest. That is a higher rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

The demand for irrigated land, because of its enormous fertility, greatly exceeds the supply. Irrigation projects are profitable; and, if rightly conducted, are free from risk. So there is great demand for money to help finance these projects, and six per cent. is paid to obtain it

$100—$500—$1,000

Irrigation bonds are issued in series, some due in two years, some in twelve years, some due every year between. One may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

They are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Irrigation bonds have become the most popular bonds that we handle. They are the safest six per cent. bonds that we know.

73 Issues Sold

In the past 15 years we have sold 73 separate issues of Drainage and Irrigation bonds, based on farm lien security. Not a dollar of loss has resulted to any investor.

We are now the largest dealers in bonds of this class. We have our own engineers and attorneys to pass on every detail. An officer of our Company constantly resides in the irrigated sections, watching the projects we finance.

Because of these facilities we get our pick of these bonds. There are very few issues which are not offered to us.

We have now written a book based on all this experience. It will give you a clear idea of all that pertains to Irrigation and Irrigation bonds. Every investor, small or large, owes to himself its perusal. The book will be sent on request.

January Investments

For January investors we have on hand 100 varieties of bonds. They include Municipal, Public Utility, Water Power, Corporation and Irrigation Bonds. Please ask for our list. Cut out this reminder so you won't forget.

A LIVING FROM POULTRY

$1,500.00 From 60 Hens in Ten Months On a City Lot 40 Feet Square

TO THE average poultryman that would seem impossible and when we tell you that we actually did a $1,500 poultry business with 60 hens on a corner in the city garden 40 feet wide by 40 feet long we are simply stating facts. It would not be possible to get such returns by any one of the systems of poultry keeping recommended and practised by the American people, still it is an easy matter when the new PHILO SYSTEM is adopted.

The Philo System is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry and in many respects just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard-of-results that are hard to believe without seeing.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success

From selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch and how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner.

Two-Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks

Are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler almost without loss, and the broilers are of the very highest quality, bringing here 3 cents per pound above the highest market price

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel

Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble and have a good supply, any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Don't Let Chicks Die in the Shell

One of our secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick and believed to be the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

Our Six-Months-Old Pullets Are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each Per Month

In a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using. Our new book, the Philo System of Poultry Keeping, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Our New Brooder Saves 2 Cents on Each Chicken

No lamp required. No danger of chilling, overheating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all the lice off the chickens automatically or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 cents.

TESTIMONIALS

South Britain, Conn., April 14, 1909.
Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N. Y.
Dear Sir:---I have followed your system as close as I could; the result is a complete success. If there can be any improvement on nature, your brooder is it. The first experience I had with your System was last December I hatched seventeen chicks under two hens, put them as soon as hatched in one of your brooders out of doors and at the age of three months I sold them at 35 cents a pound. They then averaged 2½ pounds each, and the man I sold them to said they were the finest he ever saw, and he wants all I can spare this season. Yours very truly, A. E. Nelson.

My dear Mr. Philo: Valley Falls, N.Y., September 10, 1909.
I want to tell you how pleased I am with my use of the Philo System during the past year. The fowls laid exceptionally well in the New Economy Coop, much better in proportion than those in my old-style house. The fireless brooder has solved the problem for me of raising extra early chicks. I am going into your methods more extensively this coming year. Wishing you success, I am, sincerely yours. (Rev.) E. B. Templer.

Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N.Y. Elmira, N.Y., October 30, 1909.
Dear Sir:---No doubt you will be interested to learn of our success in keeping poultry by the Philo System. Our first year's work is now nearly completed. It has given us an income of over $500 from six pedigree hens and one cockerel. Had we understood the work as well as we now do after a year's experience, we could easily have made $1,000 from the six hens. In addition to the profits from the sale of pedigree chicks we have cleared over $960, running our hatchery plant consisting of fifty-six Cycle Hatchers. We are pleased with the results, and expect to do better this coming year. With best wishes, we are, very truly yours, (Mrs.) C. P. Goodrich.

and made it possible to secure Large Profits from poultry in a small yard and with but very little capital. The thousands of successful Philo System poultry plants in all parts of the world have awakened an interest in poultry keeping never before dreamed of, and thousands of people in all walks of life, from all sections of the United States and foreign countries, are visiting the originator of these phenomenal discoveries, to see and learn at first hand how baby chickens fresh from the incubator can be raised without artificial heat every day in the year, including the coldest winter weather. The improved methods are not confined to rearing the baby chickens, as all branches of the work have been revolutionized. The demand for instruction by Government Experts, State Agricultural Colleges. Governors, Supreme Court Judges, Mayors, Preachers, Lawyers and thousands of the best people of the land made it necessary to buy and equip a large tract of land for educational purposes, and some of the massive buildings are now nearly completed and the educational work will commence at once

Eight Hundred Sacred, Popular and Patriotic Tunes

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled to produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at the average price of sheet music—30 cents each, delivered—and a roller will give a much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

The Concert Roller Organ has a fuller volume of tone and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night, and is perfect in mechanism, design, operation and effect. The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

EVERY MAN, WOMAN AND CHILD CAN PLAY IT!

The Old Prairie Schooner that Crossed the Continent

Meeker's Tent in Los Angeles

THE TRAIL THAT LED TO EMPIRE

By JOHN L. COWAN

DRIVING an ox-team from State to State, hitched to an old prairie schooner that of itself is an interesting relic of half-forgotten history, Ezra Meeker, of Puyallup, Wash., is conducting a unique campaign to have the old Oregon Trail marked from end to end, that future generations may not forget the path that led to empire. At the last session of Congress a bill was introduced for the appropriation of $50,000 for the erection of markers. The bill was favorably reported by the committee having it in charge, but in the hurry of the short session it never came up for final action, and thus died of neglect rather than on account of any active opposition. Another bill will be introduced this winter; and fearing that it, too, may fail through sheer indifference, Mr. Meeker is traveling from city to city, and from State to State, in an "outfit" similar to the one with which he traversed the Oregon Trail fifty-seven years ago, striving to awaken public interest to a point that will compel favorable action by Congress.

This unique campaign for the marking of the great highway of overland emigration began January 29, 1906, when the aged pioneer, now in his eightieth year, hitched up his ox-team and started for Washington. He arrived in the national capital November 29, 1907, having covered, with his slow-moving oxen, a distance of 3,650 miles. It was then his idea to ask Congress to appropriate funds to make of the Oregon Trail a national highway; but from this he was dissuaded by President Roosevelt, who advised him to begin by asking for the comparatively modest sum that would be necessary to appropriately mark the trail. However, it is his hope that, once the trail is marked by monuments from end to end, public interest will be aroused to such a point that the project of improving it into a great transcontinental highway will be taken up and pushed to a conclusion.

Largely through the endeavors of the Daughters of the American Revolution, the work of marking the Santa Fé Trail is now nearing completion. The State Legislatures of Missouri, Kansas and Colorado granted substantial appropriations for that purpose; large sums were contributed by the children of the public schools, and public-spirited individuals and corporations have been glad to assist. The support given to this patriotic undertaking is good cause for general felicitation; but every argument in favor of marking the great highway to the Southwest applies with still greater force to the proposition to mark the road to Oregon. The Santa Fé Trail was a trade route, traversed, in the main, for business reasons and in the pursuit of gain. The Oregon Trail was the true path of empire. The emigration over it in 1843 saved Washington and Oregon to the American Union, and a little later it became the path of a migration such as is probably without a parallel in history.

Both the Oregon and Santa Fé trails started at Independence, Mo. For forty-one miles they were identical; but where the town of Gardner now stands the Santa Fé Trail bore off to the southwest, and the newer route turned to the northwest. At the point of divergence a signboard was inscribed with the words, "Road to Oregon," indicating the northern highway. It followed the general course of the Kansas and Little Blue rivers to the Platte, reaching the last-named stream near Grand Island.

Ezra Meeker and His Dog "Jim"

It followed the Platte and Sweetwater for a distance of 630 miles, to South Pass—that hardly perceptible crossing of the "continental divide," nearly 950 miles from the starting-point of the trail. Green River was crossed, and then came Fort Bridger, 1,070 miles from Independence. Sixty miles farther on, the Bear River was forded (a stream that empties into Great Salt Lake). The valley of this stream was followed for forty miles to Soda Springs, where the trail followed by most of the California gold-seekers turned off to the south, along the upper end of Salt Lake. The road to Oregon continued on to Fort Hall, at the first crossing of the Snake River. Forty-five miles west, another California trail diverged to the south—the one used by the "Forty-niners," but later abandoned in favor of the better road that left the main trail at Soda Springs. Then down the Snake River Valley, across the Blue mountains, through the valley of the Umatilla, to the great Columbia, plodded the pioneers. The distance from the Missouri River to Fort Vancouver was 2,020 miles, and to the mouth of the Columbia 2,134 miles.

Away back in 1742 the French adventurer, De la Verendrye, reached the region of the Powder and Big Horn rivers. In 1803, the Lewis and Clark expedition outfitted at Pittsburg, left the Missouri River in May, 1804, crossed North Dakota and Montana, and went down the Snake and Columbia to the sea. Then came the fur trappers—Ezekiel Williams and Manuel Lisa, in 1807; John Colter, a member of the Lewis and Clark expedition, who remained in the wilderness until 1807, to trap beaver, discovering the Yellowstone National Park region in the interval; Major Andrew Henry, who built Fort Henry, on a fork of the Snake River, in 1810; and John Jacob Astor's overland expedition to Astoria, in 1811.

By 1820 the West was full of trappers. In 1823 Etienne Provost discovered the South Pass, and penetrated the Great Salt Lake region. In 1824, William H. Ashley led a party of trappers up the Platte and across the Green River. In 1826 he went across the South Pass again, dragging a six-pound cannon for the defense of a trading post built by him on Salt Lake. The wheels of that cannon were the first that ever turned in the famous South Pass of the Rockies!

In 1829 another trapper, William L. Sublette, got together a caravan of ten wagons in St. Louis, and started West with these loaded with merchandise, and accompanied by eighty-one men—the first wagon train that ever traversed any portion of the Oregon Trail. In the autumn the wagon train returned to St. Louis, laden with furs, and thenceforth wagons went out to the Wind River country

A NEW YEAR'S SERMON BY

Rev. Wallace MacMullen, D.D.*

An Omnipotent Ally

TEXT—Ps. 46 : 11
"The Lord of Hosts is with us: the God of Jacob is our refuge."

WE are face to face with a New Year, and we cannot be sure of its events nor of whether we shall see its successor. What does it hold for us? Hopes realized or blasted? Hearts blest or broken? Days bright or black? Sorrow or song? Riches or ruin? Life or death? Peering into the dim year that looms upon our vision, what better word for power and peace could we have than this ringing assurance of this splendid old psalm?

There are two distinct treasures offered us in the guarantee of the text—one is conquest and the other is comfort; and these are involved in the titles by which God is described and the assurances coupled with those titles.

"The Lord of Hosts"

And, first, while we, as a people or as individuals, face the tasks of a new year, or stiffen ourselves under its burdens, with what courage we may be able to muster let us listen to this guarantee of triumph: "The Lord of hosts is with us." That title, "Lord of Hosts," will repay study. If the psalm celebrates that splendid deliverance of threatened Jerusalem from Sennacherib and his invading army, which is recorded by Isaiah, as seems probable, then beleaguered Israel might find in the title the reminder of that which they had counted as true in many of their wars—that Jehovah was the unseen captain of their armies, and so they were invincible even when their forces were feeble.

> The angel of death spread his wings on the blast,
> And breathed in the face of the foe as he passed;
> And the eyes of the sleepers waxed deadly and chill,
> And their hearts beat but once and forever grew still.

So Byron vividly describes that great interference of God (Isa. 37:36). But this title, "Lord of Hosts," means more than that God was the leader of the armies of Israel. Nor does it mean only that God is leader of the angels, though that would suggest a mighty dignity. When Elisha was shut up in Dothan, and his servant was in a panic as he looked upon the imprisoning Syrian hosts, the prophet was at peace because he saw the horses and chariots of God round about the little town. The Son of God claimed to have at his disposal legions of angels. A multitude of them celebrated his birth, and members of the multitude ministered to him in his hours of special need. Milton represents the angel hosts singing the praises and describing the powers of God's militant Son and portrays that Son, when angel rebellion threatens heaven's harmony, shaking all things except God's throne under his burning chariot wheels, grasping the thunders in his hands, driving all courage out of the hearts of the rebels and scattering their forces by the mere splendor of his majesty, received back with jubilant welcome by the loyal angel hosts. To be Lord of the angels is a notable glory, but there is a power suggested in this title, "Lord of Hosts," vaster than that which is involved in the leadership of the seraphs. "So the heavens and the earth were finished and all the hosts of them," says the old record. Often the stars of heaven are called the hosts of heaven. God as the leader of all the hosts of shining worlds (Isa. 40:26)—this is the suggestion of this title, "Lord of Hosts." And this means more to us than to the psalmist, for the shining walls of the heavens have been pushed back by our glasses and their hosts have become innumerable. The title ushers us into the presence of a mighty conception—the conception of a universe, the systems and suns of which are under orders, obedient members all of them of the armies of God.

Assurances of Divine Care

Keep this meaning of God's title in mind, and then the text ushers us into the presence of a striking contrast. "The Lord of Hosts is with us." Steadily, from the researches of science, the earth has been getting smaller. Instead of the centre of a universe, as it was once thought to be, it has become a humble member of a single system. And increasing knowledge has threatened the simplicity of trust. Confidence has been deemed presumption. Since man is so small, ordinary humility should demand that he forfeit all claim on the notice of the ruler of universal hosts. But even science being judge, we could demand our share of attention from God. It belongs to the perfection of his oversight that no smallest particle escape his vision. If he not only marshals the worlds and leads them forth, but determines the position of the atoms and orders the movements of invisible forces, then we as between the two in the scale of physical importance are sure of a share in the plan and power of the Almighty. That amount of comfort is ours in the name of science.

But the word of the text, the message of the Book, the revelation of the Son, is more than this, better than this. We are assured of special care, searching love, a Father's presence. We must read this assurance of the text in the company of Jesus Christ. He is its real interpreter. It is not a bit of science—it is a Gospel. And this truth—the presence of the Lord of the innumerable hosts of an immeasurable universe—lifts every life out of any necessary obscurity, denies monotony or poverty as necessary to any destiny, assures every soul of a dignity so sublime that every mean, unworthy thought and action becomes blasphemy. Every life is sublime in which God's presence is.

> Every man is a wonder unto his creeping self,
> Who's deaf to the sky's deep thunder and groundward digs for pelf;
> Till a sudden revelation teaches him better things,
> And the spirit's exaltation gives him a sense of wings.

"A sense of wings" comes out of this, "The Lord of Hosts is with us." Is it not an inspiring truth with which to march into a New Year?

Let us notice that the title suggests purpose in connection with God's presence. It has a larger meaning than anything merely military, nevertheless it hints at conflict and conquest. There are a great many people who let despair creep into their prophecies about the future. Gloomy views about the tendencies of the race are common enough. Many are not at all ready to say that the world is growing better. They are ready to describe it as the poor sick woman in the Gospels was described, "It has suffered many things of many physicians, and is nothing bettered, but rather worse." Some there are who teach that this is the worst of all possible worlds, that life is a curse and the desire to live is the chain which binds us to our misery. Of course we must not go to the other extreme, must not be guilty of any foolish optimism; must not insist that there are only flowers on the earth and only sunshine in the sky. A clear view of danger is necessary in order to triumph.

The Forces of Evil

When we look out over our national life, for instance, we cannot be blind to threatening dangers. Criminal aliens find their refuge here and practise their crimes. The liquor traffic, scotched here and there, but a long way from being dead, debauches our souls and bodies, wastes our substance, corrupts our politics, even tries to dictate our legislation. Organized greed threatens our public resources and our common rights. Traffickers in the virtue and lives of helpless girls make their foul nests in our great cities. There are black forces enough, God knows! What then? Are we hastening on to ruin? No. What is the ground of our confidence? This, "The Lord of Hosts is with us." Is that an irrational reason for hope? On the contrary, the presence of "the Lord of Hosts" is the foundation for a valid national hope. And is there proof of the truth of the claim? Yes, there are comforting signs of his presence. The Bureau of American Republics, at Washington, established in the interests of peace; our national prominence in the Hague Conference, our unselfish policy in our island dependencies, a policy which is original in colonial history, the growing intelligent interest in municipal conditions, the awakened conscience in regard to business ethics, the call for justice in trade, the passion for social service and the immense volume of it, the gain of the church, decidedly greater in the past fifteen years than the gain in population—all these are signs that God is in our midst.

And this indicates our supreme national need as well as our chief national hope. We do indeed need legal bulwarks against foreign corruption, legal rebuke and prevention of all forms of oppression, legal annihilation of all organized crime, but, more than all else, we need the presence and power of the Lord of Hosts, for the foes of our peace, no matter what forms they may assume, are irreligion and immorality, and the conquest of these is impossible without the Lord of Hosts. Social diseases have their root causes in alienation from God, and cannot be perfectly cured without his presence.

The Duty of God's People

And this is the need and the glory of God's pledged people. If this be true—God with us—there is in the truth an absolute guarantee of victory this year. If it be true, then cowardly fear in any battle is an insult to him. In a discussion about the dangers which threaten our land one man said his only fear was that the church would lose her spirituality. God forbid! Spirituality means God's presence, and this is the supreme need of his servants if they would have their service complete. If in the church, in all her borders, in the life of every disciple, in every purse and every bit of property of God's prosperous stewards, in every message of every pulpit, in all the activities and all the methods of his armies this was proclaimed, jubilantly, triumphantly proclaimed, and the truth of it could not be gainsaid, "The Lord of Hosts is with us," ruling us, then this would be a year of superb triumph. If we really recognize him as our Captain, if we are obedient to his directing will and committed to the purposes of his life, then righteousness and love will drive ungodly avarice out of our business, we will stand like flint against sin wherever it stalks, we will be more concerned about the triumph of goodness than about the triumph of party, we will not bend one hair's-breadth from the perpendicular of absolute righteousness because of motives of policy or expediency. Besides all which, we will be active in spiritual business. The possession of God puts upon us the obligation to share our spiritual treasures with every darkened soul whom we can reach. "The Lord of Hosts is with us." Let it be our inspiration and set our task this year.

Our Sword and Our Shield

Now, while the title "Lord of Hosts" promises conquest, the other title, "God of Jacob," brings comfort. "The God of Jacob is our refuge." The tone changes, but not the truth. We are not yet out of the atmosphere of battle. The first statement deals with our aggressive warfare, the second with our defensive. The first suggests God as our leader in all our advances, the second suggests him as our fortress whenever we are attacked. He is our sword, he is also our shield.

This new title, "The God of Jacob," is in notable contrast to the former title. "The Lord of Hosts" suggests the listening, waiting armies of the angels, the arching heavens and the shining worlds. "The God of Jacob" is the God of a single weak mortal back in the centuries. How blessed that both are true! "The Lord of Hosts" is the "God of Jacob." He who orders the movements of the battalions of the skies orders the life of one soul. "The God of Jacob!" Recall what it means. On the rocky heights of Bethel a wayfarer lies asleep, a stone for his pillow, the blue heavens for his canopy. He is alone in the world—an exile from home. He is doubtful about his reception and his prospects in the distant land to which he goes. And as he dreams, perhaps of a happy lost past and a dim waiting future, into the dream comes the vision of the ladder reaching into heaven, crowded with ministering angels. And at its top the Lord God of his fathers saying, "I am with thee, I will keep thee, I will not leave thee." What a message to a lonely soul! God has not changed. Centuries after Bethel the psalmist wrote this: "The God of Jacob is our refuge."

Why seek other refuge when the God of Jacob offers welcome whenever the spirit is pursued by fear, grief or loneliness? Moreover, "The God of Jacob" suggests that he is the God of the sinner. Jacob was a deceiver, a trickster, yet God was his God. Sin is the enemy of God's purpose, but it cannot dismay his grace. "The God of Jacob" suggests, too, the God of the covenant. It is a part of his covenant title. He is the God of promise as well as the God of power. His word abideth forever. It is the sure foundation on which I can build my hopes and rest my faith, nor dream of any weakness in the solid granite of his truth imperiling my welfare. He is the God of the "Amen," so-called in Isaiah, and his Son is called "the Amen" in the Apocalypse. It is the solemn assertion that his every word is truth, that on his promise may be rested all the weight of the soul's need.

This God is our refuge. It is a sweet word. It reminds of a necessary position. There is to be some fighting in the trenches. Our defenses are to be invulnerable. We need to retreat often into the protecting life of the God of promise. This assurance does not stand first, and that fact needs to be observed. Conquest comes before comfort. And in our ideal for life that order needs to be observed. Service is to be our supreme ambition—not safety. The needs of others before the needs of self was the Master's way. And so far as personal religious experience is concerned this order of events holds true. Conquest before peace, righteousness before rest. To offer our souls as provinces to be taken and utterly possessed by the Lord of Hosts is our first need. And when God triumphs in us then will his subduing grace be our refuge as never before.

Very sweet it is to know that our Conqueror is our Comforter. When we return from some fierce battle for truth and holiness, in which we have known the inspiring leadership of our God, and then for a season are weary and dispirited, it is blessed to know that our Leader is our Retreat. "Our refuge" is an invitation to all tired souls. William Arthur, the gifted author of The Tongue of Fire, once said, "In the ear of His believing church the name of her God is music as well as thunder." Beautiful music, and of God's own making. It is the God of promise who is our refuge. His revelation is our guarantee. We dare to drop our weary souls into the hands whose fingers made the heavens only because there has been given us in the pierced hands of Calvary the vision of the eager, outstretched arms of God.

So, then, as we enter a New Year, with its appeal and its uncertainty, let us be sure that God is our power and our peace. In all its campaigns let us have him for Captain, and in all its storms let us have him for Refuge.

Does Much for the Pleasure of Christian Herald Family

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I want to thank you for the beautiful picture, "Daughters of Dorcas," and the "Dreamland" calendar, which is lovely. I wish to tell you also how much I think of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I have taken it many years, and after reading it pass it on to friends to enjoy. May heaven's greatest blessing crown all your efforts. I think you do a great deal for the happiness and pleasure of your CHRISTIAN HERALD family, and I thank you for my share.

Norwich, Conn. H. F. BENTON.

One of the Greatest Forces for Good

Dear Dr. Klopsch: We received the calendar and picture, and think them very lovely. I shall show them to my friends. I would like to see THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in every family in this town, as I consider it one of the greatest working forces for good in the country. We enjoy our paper every week. It has become like an old friend—has comforted us in times of affliction, cheered and interested us when we were discouraged and downcast and stimulated us to good works always. I would like to give you a Christmas wish, that the Lord may spare your life and health for many years.

The Price of a Day

A NEW YEAR'S SERMON FOR THE YOUNG

BY REV. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

THE first day of the New Year will soon fold its tent like an Arab, and as silently steal away. Each day has twenty-four hours, and that seems like a long time. But each hour is divided into seconds, and these tiny mites of a day slip away before you pray. They go so quickly that an hour is soon past; it won't last. As soon as one hour goes another hour starts to run after it. One part of the day you have for play, and each play hour is on roller skates. Juniors should sleep at least ten hours a day; each one of these hours steals away before you wake. In the day there is a break.

If, therefore, you are going to do anything with the days of this New Year you must be quick about it, or they will all slip away in making way for another day. Paul says we should redeem them. What does he mean? His idea is that you should buy them, purchase them, make them your own. The days of this year will go faster than any automobile. They will never have a punctured tire, and you cannot arrest them for speeding. They will just keep going on at full speed. Are you ready to purchase one day? Have you money enough to purchase a whole day? You may be surprised to learn that even one hour is of more value than an automobile. What do you suppose a day is worth? I can tell you what a very rich man by the name of Carnegie has offered, or said he would be very willing to give, for ten more years. He enjoys this world, and would like to live in it ten years more. For these ten years, if any one could sell them to him, he would be willing to give two hundred millions of dollars.

If this is the price, how much time can you purchase? In ten years there are 10,360 hours. At the rate that Mr. Carnegie is willing to pay for ten years, one day would be worth $55,255. Is that too much to pay? Then possibly you would be willing to take an hour. An hour at this rate would cost you $2,318. Is that too much for your pocketbook so soon after Christmas? Then possibly you would be willing to buy a minute. A minute would cost you just $40. I see some of you shaking your heads. You do not have $40? Then you had better buy a second, for I am sure you want to have some time that you can call your own. Now, how much would a second cost you? I want you to figure this out when you go home. If one minute cost $40, how much will one second cost? This is the price an old man is willing to pay for ten years.

Time is very much more valuable for a junior than it is for a senior. An hour now is worth ten hours when you are old. A year now is worth ten years when you are old. I am glad God does not ask you to purchase time with money. Some of you boys and girls would have to work a month of borrowed time in order to buy a second. What is the price God asks you to give for time? "Redeeming the time" means buying the opportunity. A study hour is an opportunity. If you make good use of the hour, you have purchased it, you have bought an opportunity for study. The price was hard work. If you have an hour for recitation you pay attention for the hour. An hour for play is purchased by exercise, and you get health. You buy every opportunity by using it.

The trouble with a great number of boys and girls is that they lose much of their time. The morning hour is the most valuable one of the day. Your mind has had a long rest during the night, and is fresh and ready for work. You lose the best hour. I think I know where you lost it. You will probably find it in your bed. You just turn over and drop half an hour in a nap. Two naps make a knapsack, into which you often drop an hour. Then you lose many of these valuable minutes by being late for breakfast, late at school, late for church, always behind time. Here is a verse that I would like to have you commit and repeat every night before you go to bed:

> LOST! Yesterday, somewhere between sunrise and sunset, > two Golden Hours, each set with Sixty Diamond Minutes.
> No reward is offered, for they are gone forever.

Shall I tell you a story? Here is one that is specially interesting because it is true. It is a sad story about the late Prince Napoleon. He had joined the English army, and was one day at the head of a squad riding horseback outside the camp. It was a dangerous situation. One of the company said, "We had better return; if we don't hasten we may fall into the hands of the enemy." "Oh," said the Prince, "let us stay here ten minutes, and drink our coffee." Before the ten minutes had passed a company of Zulus came upon them, and in the skirmish the Prince lost his life. His mother, when informed of the facts, in her anguish said, "That was his great mistake from babyhood. He never wanted to go to bed at night, nor to rise in the morning. He was ever pleading for ten minutes more. When too sleepy to speak, he would lift up his two little hands and spread out ten fingers, indicating that he wanted ten minutes more. On this account I sometimes called him 'Mr. Ten Minutes.'"

Redeem each and every hour of the day, and then at night, after you have said your prayer, and just before you fall asleep, you can hear Longfellow sing:

> And the night shall be filled with music,
> And the cares that infest the day
> Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
> And as silently steal away.

War on Vivisection

THE recent exhibition in New York, in the interest of the anti-vivisection movement, has called special attention to the rapidly growing public sentiment on this subject. Pictures, pamphlets, apparatus and spoken argument there formed a heart-breaking and irresistible appeal. No one who went with an open mind could fail to receive a strong impetus in the direction of revolt against present methods in this department of so-called scientific work.

The practice of confining dogs, rabbits, and other dumb animals, while under vivisection, was shown in a way to make one shudder. No wonder that many of the surgeons who have tried, in accordance with the instructions of prominent members of their profession, to perform experiments upon these quivering little bodies have had their hearts fail them in the final test.

"I determined to go through with the experiment," says one, "but the sight of those pleading eyes, and the pressing of the dog to my side for protection, unnerved me and I could not go on."

This sensitiveness, by constant work in this line, is soon turned into hardness. One writer testifies that, of a class entering a certain medical school, four-fifths were against vivisection. When they graduated, so indurated had their nerves become, that four-fifths of them were in favor of it. This leads one to feel, as Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst has strongly expressed it, that he "would not knowingly be attended by a physician who was not himself caused acute pain by the torture he inflicted upon a dumb beast. I should expect the sensibilities of such an one to be so benumbed that he would not be averse to playing any little experiment upon my body that he thought would escape detection and satisfy his professional curiosity."

The leaders in this movement beg us to remember that no argument in favor of vivisection has been advanced which cannot be met by one equally strong and from equally high authority.

The array of great names mustered by the anti-vivisectionists is truly formidable. Not only famous writers and preachers, but scores and hundreds among the world's foremost medical men have put forward signed statements declaring the practical uselessness of experiments upon living animals and the degrading effect of performing such experiments upon those who make them.

The chief object of the anti-vivisectionists at present is to get laws passed which shall limit the power to perform those experiments. Now, in most States, any man or body of men is at liberty to torture animals as much as he pleases in the name of science. The abuses which must result from such unrestraint may readily be imagined. It is said that one large drug manufacturing house in America "uses up" one thousand dogs monthly in its experiments, often heartlessly leaving them mangled and suffering. Many pseudo-medical schools, some of them empirical and entirely unauthorized by the proper sanctions, are causing dumb animals, daily, shocking and unnecessary pain. As their experiments are usually conducted behind closed doors, and the participants are pledged to secrecy regarding them, it is almost impossible, even when a State law can be invoked, to bring them to justice.

Whenever, for the sake of humanity, such experiments should be performed, a legally constituted tribunal of high character alone should give the permission. Anæsthetics should invariably be used. It is thought that stovaine, the new discovery in this department, may prove to be valuable for such purposes.

Let every one who reads these lines study this subject. The New York Anti-Vivisection Society, 2025 Broadway, New York City, will gladly send its literature at your request. The movement is important and deep-reaching. Right and truth are at stake. Whatever help to the race can come from vivisection, if any, let us have; but let us have it under worthy auspices, or not at all. Every patriotic man and women should resolve to inform himself and herself in the matter.

Boston Welcomes the Evangelists

THE return of the evangelists, Chapman and Alexander, to Boston on the 13th of December was in the nature of a triumphal entry into the city. They and the party with them were taken from the station to Tremont Temple, where an audience that filled every seat in the Temple and every foot of standing room awaited them. Their long journey of 36,000 miles, during which they spoke hundreds of times and lived the most strenuous of lives, had not wearied them in well-doing, even though it had caused some signs of physical weariness.

The Chapman-Alexander Banquet in Boston, Dec. 13, 1909

One of the greatest banquets ever given in Boston was tendered Dr. Chapman and his party in the great Mechanics' Building. Fully two thousand persons were present at this meeting. The wide galleries, seating several thousands, were filled almost as soon as the doors had been thrown open to the general public. The crowd began to assemble on the steps of the building as early as five in the afternoon, and the fact that a steady rain set in before six o'clock did not send any one away nor keep others from coming. The meeting that followed the banquet was one of great power. A representative from nearly every Protestant denomination in the city brought messages of greeting to the famous evangelists, which were read at the meeting.

Mrs. Alexander was introduced amid much enthusiasm, and Mr. Naftzger sang some of the Robert Harkness songs with his usual sweetness and power. When the party came upon the platform the entire audience rose, with cheers and waving of handkerchiefs. Dr. Chapman spoke on the text "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." He gave many reminiscences of the wonderful meetings in Australia, China, Japan, and other lands. When the meeting came to a close, hundreds remained to grasp the hand of Dr. Chapman. In some respects it was one of the most remarkable meetings ever held in Boston.

Three meetings, held on Tuesday, December 14, in the great Mechanics' Building and Tremont Temple, were attended by as many as could find seats in the building and hundreds were unable to get into the Temple. A movement is already on foot to secure the return of Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander for a long series of meetings in Boston in 1911, if it is not possible for them to come next year. Hundreds signed cards, pledging definite financial support if the evangelists will return.

Few have been able to stir Boston as these men have done. God has given them the power to speak and to sing in a way that has brought tens of thousands to the foot of the cross in all parts of the world.

THE TRAIL THAT LED TO EMPIRE

each spring with supplies for the trappers and returned in the fall with furs. In 1832 Captain Bonneville took the first wagon train across the South Pass.

But there were others besides the fur trappers and traders concerned in the transformation of the ancient and disconnected paths of the wilderness into a continuous highway. These were the missionaries. In 1832 Captain Nathaniel J. Wyeth, of Boston, led an expedition from Massachusetts to the mouth of the Columbia, Sublette and his fur traders piloting them. Wyeth returned to Massachusetts, and in 1834 again started for the wilderness, accompanied by Jason and Daniel Lee, missionaries of the Methodist Church. Wyeth stopped on the Snake River and built Fort Hall. During the ensuing four years Jason Lee established mission stations at Salem, The Dalles, Astoria, Oregon City (close to the present site of Portland), and Nishqually (where Tacoma is now located). Jason Lee was an empire builder, as well as a missionary, and he soon became convinced that prompt and decisive action was necessary to save the Oregon country to the United States. So he started East bearing with him a petition having the signatures of the few American settlers to the government, asking that it take possession of the Oregon region. His first public address was delivered at Peoria, Ill., and within a few months a party of fourteen emigrants was organized and started for Oregon. They proceeded to Bent's Fort, on the Arkansas, where the company disintegrated, three pushing on to Green River, thence to Fort Hall, and finally to a mission that had been established by Marcus Whitman. Four others of the Peoria party reached the coast in 1842. Then Marcus Whitman and Samuel Parker started for the Oregon country as missionaries of the Presbyterian Church in 1835. They joined the fur hunters at the Missouri River, proceeding with them to Fort Laramie. Whitman started East to obtain more recruits for so promising a field, while Parker proceeded on to the Columbia. Whitman, while in the East, married, and in Pittsburg he fell in with H. H. Spaulding, who also had but recently been married. Then the four made the long trip across the plains, the Rockies, the Utah desert and the Sierras in 1836. These two brides were the first white women to traverse the path of empire. This happened six years before Fremont's official discovery of the South Pass.

In 1840 Joel P. Walker, with his wife and five children, in company with several missionaries, made the journey, now ceasing to be considered worthy of particular mention, taking two wagons along as far as Fort Hall. In 1842 Elijah White's Oregon Company made the pilgrimage—a caravan of eighteen huge Conestoga wagons, with cattle, pack-mules and horses. There were one hundred and twelve men, women and children in this party—the vanguard of the countless hosts that were to traverse the plains and people the West. In 1843 a full thousand people crossed the South Pass en route to Oregon, with wagons and draft cattle, cows, horses, farming implements and household goods. In 1844 about 1,400 persons journeyed to Oregon, and in 1845 not less than 3,000. The next year a considerable number diverged from the Oregon Trail and entered California; and in the spring of 1847 Brigham Young led the Mormon pioneer company from the neighborhood of Council Bluffs to Deseret.

The Transcontinental Outline of the Oregon Trail

In May, 1846, Congress passed an act providing for the establishment of military stations along the road to Oregon. The next year the Oregon Battalion was formed, and established Fort Childs (afterward Fort Kearney), on the south bank of the Platte, just below the head of Grand Island. In 1849 came the great migration—the historic march of the "Forty-niners" to the gold fields of California. By the last of April it was estimated that 20,000 people were encamped, waiting until the grass on the plains was started to grow sufficient pasturage for their live stock. The procession started about the 1st of May, and by the middle of June there was a straggling caravan, a thousand miles long, winding westward. Then the cholera epidemic that had broken out on the Atlantic seaboard reached Independence, and quickly spread throughout the moving hosts. Not less than 5,000 emigrants fell victims to the plague and were buried on the plains, between the Missouri River and Fort Laramie; but over twenty-five thousand reached California.

The Oregon and California trails constituted the principal highways between the East and the West until the driving of the spike of gold at Promontory Point, Utah, in 1869. The great freighting caravans, the overland stages, the pony express, the Indian wars and the Mormon hand-cart emigration were all incidents properly belonging to its history. So it is easy to understand why Ezra Meeker replies to those who ask why he is so anxious to have the Oregon Trail marked by asking questions like these: "Why do you decorate a grave? Why do we as a people mark our battlefields? Why do we erect monuments to the heroic dead in battle?"

THE NEW KING OF BELGIUM

IT has been some time since a ruler of a European country has been called by death from the scene of his earthly activities and a Crown Prince has assumed the regal authority, taking up the crown and sceptre in his stead. So it was almost with a feeling of surprise that the world heard that Leopold of Belgium was no more, and that his nephew, Albert, was King of the Belgians. King Leopold had been ill for a few days, and was compelled to undergo an operation. It seemed for a day or two that he had small chance for life. He rallied surprisingly, however, and directed affairs of state from his chamber. The Belgians thought that their sovereign was destined to live for a number of years, and ceased to speculate on the policies of his successor.

Early on the morning of December 17 the King was resting easily, watched only by the nurse, who had been in constant attendance. All was quiet in the dimly lighted room. Now and then from the courtyard below could be heard the tread of the sentry on his post, and at midnight the challenge, as the guards were changed.

The night seemed destined to pass with nothing of historic note when suddenly the King roused himself and called: "J'étouffe, docteur, j'étouffe" ("I am suffocating, doctor, I am suffocating").

The royal physicians rushed to the apartment, summoned by the nurse. They did all that medical science could suggest to prolong the King's life, but Leopold sank rapidly and died a little after two in the morning, and the secretary of the late monarch sped off to Brussels to notify Prince Albert that he was no longer Crown Prince but King of the Belgians. In twenty-five minutes the new King, accompanied by Princess Clementine, entered the death chamber. He knelt and kissed his dead uncle, and, with his face bathed in tears, left the room and passed through the ante-chamber, where ministers and courtiers stood in little groups discussing in subdued voices the sudden death of the ruler who had held the helm of the Belgian State so long. They gazed with respectful interest at the young King, who was such a contrast in life, aspirations and appearance to the one who lay in the next room.

Two hundred years ago heralds would have cried, "The King is dead—long live the King!" but as it was the twentieth century the drivers of the motor car saluted stiffly instead as the new King entered his automobile and was driven to his capital.

Queen Elizabeth of Belgium

The Late King Leopold

King Albert of Belgium

Brussels had not expected the King's death, with its consequent change of rulers, and the people of the "second Paris" forgot business for a time and gathered on the streets and in the little restaurants to discuss over their cups of black coffee the great change of the night.

Probably no sovereign in Europe has aroused so much discussion in recent years, both at home and abroad. He possessed, it would seem to the foreign onlooker, but few of the qualities we associated with the hereditary ruler. The army and navy did not seem to appeal to him greatly. He was a great business man.

In a business way the Belgians believe the country has prospered during his reign. His own people did not understand him, and it is not likely that the King lost any sleep over the fact that he was the most criticised man in Europe for his own way of living and the way the Congo Free State, whose head he was, had been conducted by the government agents. The misgovernment of the Congo has proved a fruitful theme for writers of books and magazines. The Congo has been cursed with the fact that it is a valuable rubber district, and rubber, in the eyes of the Belgians, has been more valuable than men.

Leopold was born in 1835, at Brussels, and succeeded his father in 1865. In 1853 he married the Archduchess Marie of Austria. They had one son, who died early, and several daughters. The King and his daughters were not congenial, but their father never ceased, even after their marriage, to take an interest in their affairs. Their mother died in 1902, and it is rumored that the King contracted a second marriage with a lady of lower station in life and that she was near him when he died.

The new King is a great contrast to his uncle. He is the son of the late King's brother, the late Count of Flanders. He was born in 1875. He was married nine years ago to the beautiful Duchess Elizabeth of Austria. The new King and Queen are devoted to each other, and to their children, Prince Charles, who was born in 1903, and little Princess Marie, who is now three years old. The King in his home life will be an example to his people, and he has high ideals of what he owes to the land which fate has called him to rule. He is a friend of education, has traveled widely, and lived abroad to study other governments and institutions. He is an author of several books.

King Albert probably knows more than many Americans of the conditions and resources of the United States. He made a trip around the world shortly before his marriage and settled down for a long stay in this country. He made his home in St. Paul while studying the West, and wrote a book on this country. It is far ahead of most works in this line written by one from a foreign soil. It shows a marked sympathy with our institutions and with the American people. Since his marriage he has spent most of his time at home, where both he and his Queen are greatly liked by the Belgians. In 1906 Prince Albert was declared the successor to Leopold as sovereign of the Congo Free State and was also made an active member of the Belgian Upper House, or Senate. When he entered the Senate building for the first time the Senators rose and cheered with great enthusiasm. He swore to maintain the Constitution of Belgium. He also made a speech, which made a great impression for its patriotism and sincerity. All felt that when Prince Albert was called to the throne he would make a sovereign of whom they could well be proud. An energetic, patriotic ruler will give Belgium a larger place in the respect of the world.

The Royal Palace at Brussels

THE PASSING OF PRESIDENT ZELAYA

IT is unwise to act as prophet for people of so mercurial a temperament as those of Central America, but the news from Nicaragua that Zelaya, firebrand and dictator, has stepped down from the Presidential chair would seem to indicate that better things are in store for the country he has held down with an iron hand. He was forced out by the uprising of his own people, and he owes his downfall, in part, to the murder of the Americans who were shot without trial by his order. Those who have dared to protest against his tyrannical rule have been heretofore imprisoned and suffered indignities which make the blood run cold.

Those who opposed him in a business way appear to have been equally unfortunate. The Constitution of Nicaragua forbids all monopolies, yet President Zelaya has sold monopolies, and only certain persons were permitted to carry on certain lines of development, trade or industry. As a result, President Zelaya retires with a fortune of six million dollars; that is, if he is allowed to get out of the country without standing trial for unlawful acts. Only recently he had taken a determined stand, and had held his own against the revolutionists, but he could not hold his capital. Revolt spread from one quarter to another of the city during the three weeks of December, and the dictator feared for his life. Picked guards surrounded him, and he locked himself up in his own palace. Even there the roar of the crowds who marched the streets could be heard. He at last sent his resignation to Congress. In it he complained of the revolution and the action of the United States, and he said, to avoid further bloodshed, he would surrender the executive power. He said he hoped that his act would result in the re-establishment of peace and the suspension of the hostility of the United States, to which he did not wish to give the pretext for intervention.

As he has already given the pretext his concluding sentence had little force. A committee of five was appointed by the Assembly to receive the resignation. The Assembly, long the tool of the dictator, gained some spirit as the members saw the spirit of the people, and even in that body speeches were made against the power of Zelaya. Such a thing was unthinkable a few weeks ago. The President expressed his desire that he be succeeded by Dr. Madriz, of the Central American Court.

Managua has probably not seen such another day as that on which Zelaya's resignation was announced. Back and forth marched the crowds, from one gate to another, cheering for the United States, for Estrada, and for the army of the revolution, while Zelaya, behind his walls, waited with his armed retainers, fearful lest the passions of the people might lead them to seek immediate reprisals for his past acts.

The United States has sent another transport southward, with marines. The resgnation must necessarily make some difference in the plans of the authorities at Washington, but at this writing they are not known to the general public. Other vessels are being fitted out, and more marines are on the way. Evidently our government means to have peace, if it has to first fight for it.

The Old Year and the New

AS the last hours of the Old Year are passing, it is well to devote some of them at least to quiet retrospection. It has been a year full of mercies and rich in blessings. Peace and prosperity have reigned within our borders, and, while there have been some dark days in Nineteen-nine—as there are in all years—there has been far more of sunshine than of shadow. On the whole, it has been a good year; so, while we are always glad to welcome the New, we will cast a kindly and regretful backward glance on the Old Year, being mindful of the many happy days we have enjoyed during his stay with us.

For all its friends at home and abroad, for its great world-wide "Family Circle," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invokes the blessings of health and happiness and of increased joy in the service of humanity in the coming year. So may 1910 bring to each and all the special gifts and opportunities we most need, which, if we use them rightly, should go very far toward making it the happiest year in our lives.

The President and the Bowery

IT was a new note which President Taft sounded in his recent speech to the unemployed at the Bowery Mission—a speech which is now famous from one end of the country to the other. It was the note of cheer and encouragement from the Executive head of this nation, whose visit there established an exalted precedent and set a worthy example. He stepped down for the moment from the social environment of his high position to that humblest and saddest of thoroughfares. He had often heard of the Bowery, he said, and had no little curiosity regarding it.

It was a great privilege for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be the first to introduce him to the lowest stratum of American citizenship—the submerged, the friendless, the hopeless, the down-and-out, of whom there are many thousands in New York and other large cities. It is a fortunate thing for the country that Mr. Taft's brilliant career has not made him cold and indifferent; he is genial, kindly, and intensely human. Through his big frame there flows a warm current of sympathy with suffering and misfortune, and his talk with the men of the Bowery, social outcasts as they are reckoned, gave them a glimpse of the goodness of his heart, and made them feel that the speaker was first a man, then a President. Trained in judging human nature, his kindly eye penetrated beneath the poor garments and the mean exterior, and he knew that these men and lads before him needed only the spur of a kindly word and the slightest opportunity to prove themselves good, industrious, self-respecting citizens. In the driving December storm he came to them as a messenger of cheer, telling them that even at the time when the skies were blackest and when it seemed as if everybody had turned against them they were not friendless, for there were people who stood ready to help them to better things.

This is the real note of the uplift. It is when we are down, and weak with struggling, that we most need the grasp of the friendly hand to help us upon our feet. And there can be nothing more eloquent in this world than such a hand, when it reaches out at the right moment. It inspires courage, restores self-respect, gives strength to the weak, makes the battle with adversity less arduous. There is nothing that President Taft has done or can do in his administration that will be better remembered by the common people, who, as Lincoln said, "are the most of folks." It was a brave and manly thing that he did down at the Bowery Mission, and society is his debtor for it. His words and example have done more to close the gap between rich and poor than anything else that could possibly have happened. In that half hour, when he stood face to face with the men of the Bowery, whom he called his "boys," we believe he received as much as he gave.

It would, perhaps, be too much to hope that Mr. Taft's visit might give a new stimulus to philanthropy, or would bring about a better acquaintance between those who possess wealth and position and their fellows who have been buffeted and beaten down in the battle of life. Still, it will make many people think. As far as the rough men of the Bowery themselves are concerned, they are already well nigh convinced that they entertained "an angel unawares."

The Redemption of Little Dora

IN a recent issue, we printed the touching appeal of a missionary in West Africa for the redemption of a native Liberian girl named Dora, whose father, a Christian convert from heathenism, had lately died. According to ancient tribal law, the fatherless children in African families pass into the custody of the nearest male relative. Should that relative happen to be a heathen, as in the present case, the children could be taken away into heathenism, brought up to worship idols, and, if girls, traded off or practically sold to become the wives of heathen men. This was the fate that threatened little Dora. Fortunately, native law and custom permit the redemption of children by paying a stated price in oxen, farm produce or cotton cloth to the "headman" of the family. This privilege is extended to the missionaries, who have saved many children to Christianity by paying the stipulated ranson. Missionary Perkins, of Cape Palmas, pleaded for Dora, who had been baptized at the mission. Within a few days after his letter appeared in our columns several readers came to the rescue with their voluntary gifts toward a redemption fund. On December 11 Dr. Klopsch, in view of the urgency of the case, anticipated further contributions and cabled to Mr. Perkins to arrange immediately for the redemption of Dora, adding that fifty pounds sterling ($250) was on the way and would be in his hands by Christmas Day, when the transaction could be completed.

Before this issue reaches our readers little Dora will doubtless have been redeemed. She will have been "bought with a price," not to enter upon a new slavery, but to begin a life of freedom and happiness. She will have been safely transferred from heathen surroundings to the pleasant home and pure influences of the mission, where she will be brought up as a Christian girl. It is a beautiful coincidence that her redemption should have taken place at the Christmas season, at the time when God gave to the world the gift of his own well-beloved Son, a ranson for sinners.

We shall hear more of little Dora when the detailed story of her redemption comes from Liberia, but meanwhile many hearts will rejoice that so much has already been accomplished.

The Ideal Home

A CORRESPONDENT wrote the other day, asking for a description of an ideal Christian home. Such a home can hardly be fully pictured within the compass of a few paragraphs. We might say in simple phrase: that it is a type of heaven; that it is full of happiness; that in the deepest meaning of the term it fulfils the poet's thought in "Home, Sweet Home." Even as we repeat them the words seem insufficient. The ideal home is a place so beautiful, so fragrant, so perfect through and through, that language halts when we try to define its charm.

In the first place, such a home lays no hand of despotism on any one who is grown up. It lovingly trains the little children in the way they should go. In this world of ours, perfect liberty is never possible except under the reign of law which is built upon justice. Whenever and wherever liberty is divorced from law we have direful consequences. Planets and seasons move in obedience to law. Throughout nature there is freedom, but it is the freedom that follows the march of the divine mandate.

In the ideal home husband and wife love and trust one another. Jealousy and suspicion never cross its threshold. The children are merry, eager, truthful, fearless and obedient. They know that in rendering obedience to their parents they are obeying their Father in heaven. They are trained to be manly, God-fearing men, and pure-hearted, womanly women. Common interests weld together the household group, and if there be old people beneath the roof, or one crippled, infirm or ill, the tenderest deference and care are given to them.

In the very centre and core of this ideal home Christ abides. He is not there as an occasional guest, but as a constant inmate. The family altar is there. And no home in which Christ is enthroned will ever degenerate to low levels of sordidness, or fall beneath the standard of integrity, or forget that it represents to all beholders the Spirit of Him who went about doing good.

Exit Zelaya

NICARAGUA is to be congratulated on the retirement of President Zelaya, whose administration seems to have had much in common with that of the unlamented Castro, ex-President of Venezuela. Zelaya was a shrewd, mercenary despot, who made his high office a vehicle for his own enrichment. He is said to have amassed a fortune of six millions by traffic in monopolies and irregular concessions. Now, having been the cause of serious complications, which must ultimately have crushed him, he makes a virtue of necessity and, on the pretext of saving Nicaragua from American intervention, he lays down his office. His resignation simplifies the situation, but there will still remain to be adjusted the question of indemnity for the illegal execution of the two Americans, Groce and Cannon, and the measures necessary for the re-establishment of peace in the little Central American republic. It is not improbable that the revolutionary forces under General Estrada may oppose the selection of Dr. Madriz, Zelaya's chosen successor, and that nothing short of a decisive battle will settle the question. Meanwhile, our warships will be on the scene in readiness for emergencies and for the protection of American and foreign interests.

GENERAL NOTES

—NEXT WEEK'S ISSUE will contain the promised article giving details of President Taft's recent visit to the Bowery Mission.

—OUR ASTRONOMERS HAVE their pleasant little differences, just like other mortals. They rarely agree when the question of a new discovery arises; but their exalted disputations interest even the unscientific mind. To be told that the earth "caught" the moon and annexed it as its satellite four hundred million years ago; that the craters and other configurations on the lunar surface are the marks of pre-annexation collisions with other planets, and that one vagrant luminary has an orbit so vast that it only comes within the field of our great telescopes once in four hundred years is to talk in a language that reminds each of us what an infinitesimal creature is man and how brief his span of existence.

—THE DEATH OF Leopold II., King of the Belgians, takes from the human stage a remarkable character. There has been much diversity of opinion concerning his course in Congo affairs, and not a little of the responsibility for abnormal conditions in the "Free State" and for the cruelties practised on the natives has been charged against him; but it is beyond dispute that among his own subjects in Belgium he enjoyed unbounded popularity and was regarded as a national benefactor. Born in 1835 and reigning as monarch for forty-four years, he has been for nearly half a century an important factor in the politics of Europe. He not only protected his tiny kingdom from encroachment, but exerted an influence among the larger powers which was far beyond that to which little Belgium would ordinarily have been entitled. An avowed pleasure-seeker, yet courageous, able, public-spirited, and skilled in all the affairs of government, his life was greatly saddened by domestic unhappiness. The darkest blot on the fair fame of his reign was the misrule of the Congo; but to what extent he was personally responsible for this has never been definitely shown.

The Spade in Peru

THE spade in Peru has uncovered bones and art relics of a people who are supposed to have existed five thousand years before Christ. Mr. T. Hewitt Myring, suffering from the climate of the high altitude of Bolivia, accepted an invitation given by a friend to visit his sugar plantation in the Chimcana Valley of Peru, that he might recuperate his health. There he dug up as many as 750 works of prehistoric art, which are filling the world with amazement and delight and which will doubtless find a place in the British Museum. This valley is famous as the supposed place where the buried treasure of the Incas was concealed about the middle of the sixteenth century. The legend runs that the Incas were bringing to the Spaniards a ransom for their captured king, but the news of his death reaching them before they arrived at the coast, they decided to bury the treasure rather than give it to their enemies. This they did, dividing it into two portions, the largest one being known as the Big Fish and the smaller one as the Little Fish. But the Chimu pottery, which Mr. Myring unearthed in this same valley, is thought to have been fashioned by fingers more than six thousand years before the Incas came upon the stage. These specimens indicate that there existed on the western slopes of the Andes so many thousand years ago a civilization that was of a much higher type than any had thought possible. These treasures were dug out of a single tumulus, some three miles in extent, which was found to contain about 2,000 graves of Chimus of all classes, from six chiefs, each in a separate tomb of sun-dried bricks, to commoners and criminals. The whole of the pottery had been buried with the dead. The investigations and discoveries of modern science have compelled the tombs to reveal their secrets. The preservation of the works of art untarnished in their beauty among the crumbling bones and skulls suggests the superiority of the intellectual and spiritual over the physical. There were some busy years in the dim past for these Chimus, but there have been thousands of years since of silence and of stillness. The bones and pieces of earthenware have been covered up under the quilt of earth, and have been motionless until now. Whatever we, or the people of our generation, do for God or for our fellowmen must be done quickly, must be done now, as the tomb will end all earthly toil. The inactivity of the tomb the preacher gives as a reason for earthly diligence.

Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest. (Eccles. 9 : 10.)

Lost Without a Pilot

The Spanish bark San Antonio, from Barcelona, went on the rocks at the entrance of Havana harbor the other day and was lost. The captain undertook to enter the harbor without a pilot, and as a result his boat struck the rocks and sank in eighteen feet of water. How important it is in navigating the sea of life, and in entering its port, to have aboard a pilot who knows the shoals and dangers, and can find the deep, safe channel into the harbor; and how many there are who neglect to have the pilot aboard, who knows the way, and undertake to sail the ship themselves, with the result that their boat is broken to pieces on the rocks and goes down into the waves. The prophet, in referring to the mariners of Tyre, the merchant city, indicated that their wise men were selected as pilots.

Thy wise men, O Tyrus, that were in thee, were thy pilots. (Ezek. 27 : 8.)

Library Helped Him

John R. Van Wormer, vice-president of the Lincoln Trust Company, in his will dividing his property among his heirs, has this singular clause:

"My library is especially valuable to me because of the associations and of the intrinsic relation it has borne to the formation of my intellectual life. If properly disposed of, it should bring a much larger amount than was paid for it. Part of the first money I earned I invested in books, and the habit of acquiring them has grown with my growth and been strengthened with my strength."

Books have an untold influence in the development of the mind and in the formation of character. Books that are trivial fritter away the intellectual faculties, those that are bad or questionably good corrupt the heart. Able and good books feed the intellect and the heart. A library which has not love, truth, justice, purity, which has not God or Christ or the personal presence of the Deity, will not contribute to the development of the highest manhood or womanhood or the most exalted destiny. Solomon emphasizes the value of this spiritual instruction.

Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding. (Prov. 4 : 7.)

U. S. Army Deserters

The report of the Adjutant-General for the year reveals the astounding fact that there were 4,993 young soldiers who deserted. The military service of the country has steadily improved in its personnel and is strongly attractive to many a young man who loves his country and desires to make a career for himself. There are so many manly soldiers in the military service that the public will scarcely be prepared to believe that within seven of 5,000 of their number would abandon that service without asking permission. Many bad boys enter the army, and prove themselves to be good-for-nothing there as everywhere. Some tire of the monotony of the camp, and some are crazed by bad whisky to do every disloyal thing. The government may have to make it harder to get in and harder to get out of the Army, and enforce a heavier penalty upon the deserter. It would be a fortunate thing for the church if 5,000 limited the number of those who turn deserters in the army of the Lord each year. They are enticed away from loyalty to their Lord by the fascinations and temptations of this life. Paul at the close of his life, in the moment of victorious exultation, refers to his loyal service in the army of God in these words: "I have fought a good fight." But almost in the next breath he makes mention of a deserter from the ranks in these words:

For Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world. (II. Tim. 4 : 10.)

Fortune Came too Late

After twenty-seven years searching for a fortune he finally found, William W. Tolds started from Alaska for Bristol, England, his old home. Their little home in the suburb of the English city had been mortgaged and his wife had struggled early and late to lift the burden, but found herself unable to do so, and the property had been sold for debt. Worry and disappointment at the hard fight against want had seriously impaired her health. Tolds had left Bristol in 1882, during the excitement of a mineral discovery on an island off the present town of Skagway. Two years ago he fell into a fortune; two months ago he wrote his wife, telling her of his good luck and that he was coming home, to make her life easy ever after. When he got to Denver a telegram met him, telling him of the death of his wife; and, broken-hearted, he turned back to the Olholt mining camp in Alaska, where he made his fortune, there to remain until he dies.

We see here the folly of putting off into the future the things that ought to be attended to to-day—a postponing of kindly acts and favors to loved ones, which ought to be exercised at once. Mr. Tolds ought to have notified his family of his success two years ago, ought to have lifted the mortgage on the property and taken the burden from the shoulders and heart of his wife. Thousands and tens of thousands of kind words and affectionate deeds are promised to those who are near and dear to us; but death interferes and leaves them unsaid and undone. There is but one thing to do, and that is to crowd our lives full of love and blessing toward our own and those that are about us, knowing that death is liable at any time to cut short our plans and labors.

Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth. (Prov. 27 : 1.)

Marvelous Ocean Liners

The modern steamship is a marvelous institution from every point of view: in its construction, its swiftness and the luxury of its appointments. Every convenience that can be found at any first-class hotel is to be had for those who have the money to pay for it. The appointments for comfort are perfect, including the passenger elevator going up and down the five decks. It would require the product of an ordinary farm for a year to provision one of these ocean liners for a single trip. The Lusitania on her last voyage took as food for passengers and crew 40 oxen, 80 sheep, 130 pigs, 10 calves, 60 lambs, 2,000 chickens, 150 turkeys, 350 ducks, 90 geese, 800 quails, 400 pigeons, 250 partridges, 250 grouse, 200 pheasants, 200 snipe, besides hundreds of boxes of fish, oysters, turtles, and a huge supply of condiments and crate upon crate of fruits and vegetables of all varieties. With the food secured, the human cargo was then taken on board. Besides the 800 or 900 of the crew required to man her, about 2,000 passengers of one class or another were registered, making a total of 3,000 souls, enough to found an important village, and there was such perfect system maintained that 2,000 passengers, coming on board from seven o'clock up to noon, were settled in their places and seated at luncheon and served without friction of any kind. What a wonderful evolution there has been in ocean travel since the City of Savannah, an old side-wheeler, crossed the Atlantic, taking thirty-four days to make the trip from Savannah, Ga., to Liverpool! Still more wonderful is the change since the ships of commerce in Solomon's time, which made their trips only once in three years.

For the king's ships went to Tarshish with the servants of Huram: every three years once came the ships of Tarshish bringing gold and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks. (II. Chron. 9 : 21.)

Ethics in Public Schools

Animated discussions have been carried on in New York City over the question of how far morals should be taught in the public schools, and those who have used such tremendous pressure to crowd the Bible out of the public schools have taken another step in claiming that ethics, or morals, should not be taught in the schools, because by that road some form of religious instruction might creep in. It is charged that sectarian bias would crop out and that proselytism would result. The enemies of moral instruction in the schools are leading us to the danger line. Every good teacher in our schools must necessarily teach ethics and morals by example as well as precept, if duty be done by the scholar, and the more of the Bible and Christ the teacher may have in the heart or on the lip the more thorough the instruction will be in all departments of learning and the more complete will be the character developed. A guide with such a lamp is likely to lead the footsteps of childhood into the proper path.

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. (Ps. 119 : 105.)

PRESIDENT TAFT AND AFRICA

THE great celebration of the African "Diamond Jubilee," in Carnegie Hall on the evening of December 13, was a notable occasion for many reasons, not the least of which was the presence there of President Taft.

His speech was important in its high praise of Methodism, its appreciation of the great work of Methodist missionaries in Africa, and his deliverances on the subject of international comity and responsibility.

He characterized the Methodist attack upon the barbarism of the Dark Continent as "affirmative, aggressive, pushing and practical"; and rejoiced that he was able to testify in such unqualified terms regarding the good work of another denomination than his own.

"My reception here," he continued, "makes me certain of the growing and wide catholicity of the Christian Church—the increase in the feeling of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man among all denominations."

As ever, when speaking at a missionary meeting, as he has done many times, President Taft alluded feelingly to the glorious work done by our missionaries. His tributes come with especial force, as from a man who has had extensive opportunities for observation of missionary work in foreign lands.

"I have heard missions criticised," he said. "I have heard men say that we might as well leave savages to pursue their own lives, and look after our own people. I have come to regard such men as narrow-minded. Our missionaries are the forerunners of our civilization. Without them we should have no hope of courting the love and the respect of the millions that we hope to bring under the influence of the Christian religion. I admire those who go to India, China and the Philippines; but the men I wish most to commend are those who, in the face of obstacles that might well discourage the bravest, enter the dark continent of Africa in an attempt to win it to Christianity."

The President dwelt with emphasis upon our responsibility to the colored race, through the sin of our ancestors in importing so many of them into slavery; yet, as he reminded his audience, it was but an illustration of the mysterious way in which Providence accomplishes its purposes, that those whom we held in slavery so long are now at least one hundred years in advance of their kindred who remained in Africa.

But perhaps the most significant portion of the President's address was that in which he dwelt upon Washington's famous injunction, in his farewell address to his countrymen, "to avoid entangling alliances" with foreign nations.

This admonition was given to a republic consisting of thirteen small States, poor, just breaking out a path for themselves, and struggling for existence.

"But now," he continued, "we are a nation with tremendous power and tremendous wealth, and unless we use them for the benefit of our international neighbors we are failing in our duty."

He expressed the wish that Bishop Hartzell might take back to Africa with him three millions instead of three hundred thousand dollars, the sum which he had set out to raise when he came to this country last year.

The good Bishop responded that he had already secured $20,000 more than he had expected, and was working for $30,000 more.

A great laugh was raised when Bishop Hartzell called attention to the map of Africa, and insisted that the President should look, too. In order to do this, he had to turn his chair about and sit with his back to the audience.

It was a time of great enthusiasm, and apparently Bishop Hartzell will have no trouble in filling out his $350,000. Upon the platform at this wonderful meeting sat many distinguished ministers of the Episcopal, Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian, and other sects; but all were one in their admiration for the great work of Bishop Hartzell and their approbation of the broad and manly sentiments of the President.

"A Dream of Beauty"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I am in receipt of beautiful "Dreamland," which is indeed a dream of beauty. It justifies all the praise it receives. I send many thanks, also some extra ones for the lovely "Daughters of Dorcas," which came somewhat as a surprise, as I had not been thinking of receiving that. Your Washington picture of last year, nicely framed, hangs in a schoolroom, an object of pleasure and instruction. Two other pictures, which you sent, are in the room of a physician—a lover of art. One gladdens the heart of a poor old lady, who has but few pleasures in life. One has just been sent away in a home missionary box, and the little girl "Under the Apple Tree" will, this coming Christmas, find a place in another little girl's "nest." I feel that in making this disposition of the gems I have conferred pleasure, and experienced the blessing of the giver. JULIA M. WHITE.

New London, Conn.

The Book is a Treasure

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I want to thank you for the splendid premiums. The pictures are exquisite, the sleeping child is so lovely, and the other beautiful, and the book, Before the Doctor Comes, I am so glad to have. It is indeed a treasure. It cannot but be very useful in emergencies at home, and if a neighbor calls us in distress. Thank you very much for them.

Geneva, N. Y. SARAH E. TAYLOR.

In Love with that Dear Baby

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have just received the beautiful calendar and picture of the "Daughters of Dorcas," for which I thank you, and appreciate the gift. I can best express my gratification by saying, "I am in love with that dear baby."

Orange, N. J. (MRS.) S. V. TATE.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST DAN SHANNON has just closed a six weeks' Tabernacle meeting at Baker City, Ore.; 1,928 made profession of faith, 500 being men. People drove in 35 miles to the meetings. They gave the evangelist a free-will offering of $1,500.

—THE FEDERATION OF GOSPEL MISSIONS has now 170 members upon its rolls. Forty-two cities and seventeen States are represented. The membership fee is $1. Mrs. Wright, 19-21 North Clover Street, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., is secretary.

—A VERY ACTIVE evangelistic campaign has been going on in Montgomery County, Indiana, under the direction of Rev. E. L. Buchanan, of Lafayette, Ind. He was assisted by the General Assembly's evangelistic commiteee of the Presbyterian Church.

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., who are now conducting union meetings in Bay City, Mich., held a mass meeting for men only in the Washington Theatre, the largest in the city, on a recent Sunday afternoon. Over fifty men confessed Christ at this service.

—BISHOP STRINGER and his wife, two well-known missionaries in the Northwest, have perished, Indians report, somewhere between Alberta and Dawson City, for which place the couple started overland last June. They expected to reach Dawson City in October, but nothing has been heard from them for two months. Bishop Stringer's pastoral charge was a vast region in the far Northwest of this continent, known as the Yukon diocese, reaching through the westernmost part of British America to the Arctic Ocean.

—LINCOLN UNIVERSITY, which lately suffered a great loss in the death of General O. O. Howard, has just experienced a new calamity in the loss by fire of the beautiful Grant-Lee Hall, the largest of its group of buildings. The Hall, which was a dormitory for over one hundred students, was burned to the ground on December 14. President Stooksbury says the students will quit class-work and rebuild at once. Money is needed, and we hope the generous American public will give liberally to Lincoln University to help it rebuild Grant-Lee Hall.

—THE SECOND AVENUE Baptist Church of New York City has just celebrated the completion of a hundred years of Christian service in lower New York. This grand old church, whose present pastor is the Rev. Robert F. Y. Pierce, is doing a noble work, and has many branches of Gospel activity, including Bible classes, several mission chapels, sewing schools, Sunshine Clubs, missionary training school, singing classes, etc. It is a spiritual beehive. Its corps of trained workers, speaking several languages, is continually engaged among the foreign element in the neighborhood around Second Avenue, between Tenth and Eleventh Streets, New York.

—THE BELLA COOKE MISSION, at No. 239 East Twenty-seventh Street, New York, is preparing for Christmas work among the East Side poor. Mrs. Mary E. Pullman (daughter of Bella Cooke) writes: "We need money to help our poor and sick; we need a stock of groceries and medicines, which we propose to dispense." In past years Mrs. Bella Cooke, the "Saint of Second Avenue," made Christmas a memorable season to hundreds of very poor East Side homes. The Mission is prepared to continue the good work, and appeals to the friends of Mrs. Cooke throughout the country to help it along with their contributions and their prayers.

—EVANGELIST J. H. SOBEY writes from Empire, Canal Zone, Panama: "We are in the thick of the fight. Uncle Sam is rushing forward the great work of canal construction, and the devil is doing his work rushing men to destruction. The moral condition on the Zone is not worse than in some other places, possibly better; but exceptional conditions should compel improvements: the drink causing so much mischief should be cut out; it should be made difficult for men to get the drink; home life and health would be all the better. Gambling, while not legalized, is too common. Panama and Colon are hotbeds of vice; iniquity abounds; so many drift, degenerate, and are soon lost sight of. We need a revival. We have recently opened a well-built church in Colon, seating capacity 500. Services are well attended, and already some have yielded to Jesus and follow him."

—THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America held their annual meeting in Louisville, Ky., December 7 to 9. Encouraging reports were submitted telling of the work of local and State Federations. The State Federations of Massachusetts and Rhode Island have become a growing power for good in these ancient commonwealths. In Vermont sixty-four instances of local interdenominational action in the interest of unity have been discovered. The Wisconsin Federation of Churches appointed a committee to organize and take up the calling of a conference next fall, of from 500 to 1,000 representatives of the churches. Maine reported the best year in its history. The most important action taken was that connected with the report of the Commission on the Church and Social Service. This action opened the way for the formulation of plans pledging a union of forces that will call world-wide attention to the Federal Council as the chosen instrumentality to secure a larger combined influence in all matters affecting the moral and social condition of the people.

His Favorite Paper

Dear Dr. Klopsch: With pleasure I acknowledge the receipt of The Story Bible, "Dreamland" calendar and "Daughters of Dorcas" with my renewal for 1910. All are beautiful and should be in every home. I have long been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and have ever looked upon it as standing in the foremost rank of our national educators. Through no other channel has so much been done for suffering humanity, either at home or abroad. It is one of our greatest bulwarks against every tidal wave of sin. It preaches the religion of a loving Christ, which enters into our being, speaks to our reason, conscience and intelligence, and we turn from its pages resolving to live better lives.

I have long since passed the limit of three-score and ten. If I had my desire granted, it would be to place THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in every home in our land. A. H. LEMON.

Beebe, Ark.

Both Rare Gems of Art

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have just received your generous gift, the calendar and the beautiful picture. They both are rare gems of art. I think it is a lovely thing for you to give happiness to so many. I enjoy THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and do not want to be without it. Many thanks for your Christmas gift. (MRS.) W. S. BABBITT.

Would Frame "Sleeping Beauty"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The beautiful calendar and "Daughters of Dorcas" have been received, with greatest pleasure. I am tempted to cut off the calendar part and frame the sleeping beauty. I am glad to belong to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family.

LIKE A SECOND HELEN KELLER

AN interesting and pathetic experiment is in progress at the Mount Airy Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, Philadelphia. A child is being educated there who can neither see nor hear, and consequently cannot speak. This remarkable task is being undertaken in the case of little Katie Frick, a girl who promises to be as wonderful in her way as Helen Keller. Deaf, dumb and blind, she has so far progressed in her education as to be able to write letters home to her parents. The Legislature of Pennsylvania has granted the sum of $2,000 for the education of this afflicted child, and the grant is proving a wise one.

Katie's education has not reached its present stage by any easy pathway. Miss Julia A. Foley, who has devoted herself to the training of the child, deserves high praise for the patience and untiring interest she has shown with her afflicted pupil. Katie, in infancy, had some slight trace of speech, and the complete deprivation of the two senses came to her when she was six years old, caused, it is said, by prolonged surf bathing. In the succeeding years, the blind and deaf child lost most of the knowledge of speech that she had acquired in babyhood, and when received at Mount Airy she could say but a few words. Up to the present time the chief object of the child's teaching has been to perfect a rapid, effective means of communication through the use of the manual alphabet.

By means of wooden blocks Katie was taught to count. Blocks numbered from one to ten were given her, and she was taught that the figure on the four block signified that number by four other blocks being placed where she could count them with her disengaged hand while holding one hand on the figure. In this manner the shape and value of all the figures were impressed upon the mind of the little girl, and gradually she became able to put numbers together and count up to high figures.

But the crowning triumph of the effort to impart knowledge to the child came when she learned to write and sent her first letter home. This is the way it was done: When Katie had learned to use a needle and thread with some facility, a cardboard alphabet was prepared for her. Each square of cardboard bore a letter of the alphabet, done in perforations that followed the outline of that particular letter. With her needle and thread Katie followed the perforations until she had sewn on the cardboard a complete outline of the letter "A." Then the little girl knew the shape of the first letter of the alphabet, and that much progress was made. Having sewn one letter on the cardboard, and with the sewing imprinted it indelibly on her memory, Katie repeated the process with the letter "B," and so on to the end of the alphabet. When Katie had learned the appearance and meaning of the capitals she was taught the smaller letters, and now is able to separate one from the other and name any letter that she can pass her finger over. By such simple but ingenious means her teachers are training her.

Dumb and Blind Katie Frick Learning to Form Words

Having learned the shape and meaning of the letters of the alphabet, the next step was to teach her to put them together and so form letters into words and understand the meaning of the words. This is the present stage of the education of the child. She is learning to write simple words and to know what they signify by the object itself being brought to her, so that she can familiarize herself by the sense of touch with its outlines. For instance, she will be taught the way to write D-O-L-L. When she has sewn the four letters on cardboard, a doll is brought her, and she is shown the connection between the written word and the object.

The first impulse Katie had, when she found she could remember the shape of the letters of the alphabet and connect these letters so as to form intelligent words, was to write a letter home. The teachers were delighted with the idea, and brought her a long piece of cardboard and a hatpin, and left her to write her letter. The simple method is to prick the letters into the cardboard so that the words can be read by the perforations. As Katie had to guide the hatpin with one finger, held beside the point to ensure the straightness of the outline, and had to make frequent stops while another finger traveled over the reverse side of the cardboard to see if the perforated writing was being done correctly, the writing of the letter was a slow process; but it was finished and mailed at last, with a sense of pleasure that could hardly have been exceeded by the joy experienced by the parents when the letter arrived.

In time an effort will be made to train the vocal organs so that the lost speech may be regained. When Katie can answer questions asked her in the manual alphabet with spoken words, the education of the child will have progressed a long way.

TRAINING THE AFRICAN YOUTH

By H. B. GHORMLEY

THE Edwaleni Training School, at Edwaleni, Natal, South Africa, is for the education of native young men and boys for various useful vocations, as well as in the doctrines and experience of experimental Christianity and the usual branches of study. Christian boarding schools are not plentiful in South Africa. Missionaries and native teachers accomplish much by their efforts to gather in, for a few hours daily, the children adjacent to the mission station; but the African child spends the greater part of his time among heathen environments, and is of necessity subject to a serious handicap on that account. Too often the boy who has but the limited advantages of the station school is found later in life with something of a smattering of learning, but devoid of moral and religious strength. To develop strong Christian character he must be in contact with uplifting influences during the formative period of life, and especially if he is to become qualified in the Word of God so as "to be able to teach others also."

In the Edwaleni school the aim, in addition to something of an advanced idea of agriculture, is to make the boy acquainted with the use of tools of various kinds. We issue a small school paper, the Isibalo Sasedwaleni. This, with job work, enables some of the boys to learn something of printing. Others receive normal training, expecting to become teachers and to labor for the uplifting of their people. Still others are given training in the Bible and allied subjects, that they may some time be able to preach the blessed Gospel to the native people of their own land.

We are fifteen miles from the sea, on the Umtamvuna River, Natal side. The climate is very healthful, for Africa, being very similar to that of Lower California. Our proximity to Cape Colony makes it convenient for the native tribes of that colony to send their boys to us.

Our greatest material need is a proper building for dormitory and school purposes. Hitherto, our young men have been crowded into very small quarters. Summer and winter you may see classes reciting under the trees; perhaps, when the wind is cold, to the leeward of a friendly bush. To accomplish best results, comfortable buildings of adequate capacity are needed in Africa no less than in America.

The Original "Flying Ferry" in Operation at Edwaleni

Our present plan contemplates a school building to cost $10,000. Here is a gracious opportunity for Sunday Schools, junior missionary societies and similar organizations to help. May we not also expect that Christians, to whom the Lord has granted temporal prosperity, will personally see it to be their privilege to invest substantially? We trust to have a place in your prayers and benefactions.

A "flying ferry," invented by J. B. Corey almost half a century ago for the purpose of ferrying people across the Monongahela River, now is being used on the Umtamvuna River, between Natal and Cape Colony, South Africa, to transport African converts to the Edwaleni school. Mr. Corey says that several years ago he was sitting at his desk when the letter carrier brought him a religious newspaper. He noticed from a picture that the only means of crossing the stream were two wires. A man was walking on one wire and holding on to the other with his hands.

Mr. Corey quickly remarked that he would send the missionaries a plan of his "flying ferry," and a friend told him to accompany it with a check for $150, which he did. The ferry is operated by placing an anchor or heavy instrument in the middle of the stream. To this is attached a wire cable, the other end of which is attached to the ferry. The anchor is situated 400 or 500 feet above the ferry landing.

Will Frame Her Pretty Picture

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Many, many thanks for the beautiful picture, "Happy Days," received by to-day's mail. A pretty frame is already engaged for it, and it will contribute to our pleasure for years to come.

The Gifts Are Indeed Beautiful

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Received the "Dreamland" calendar for 1910 and the picture, "Daughters of Dorcas." They are indeed beautiful. The calendar I will give to one of my granddaughters to put in her schoolroom, for her little kindergartners to enjoy. The other one I will have framed for another granddaughter to hang in her room. They will both be appreciated. May you live many years to carry on your great work. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is invaluable.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

J. A. G., Asbury Park, N. J. Please give the meaning of the words "hades," "sheol" and "hell."

"Hades" (Greek) signified simply the abode of departed spirits, without reference to their merits or demerits. "Sheol" (Hebrew) means a cave, and was used by the Hebrews to denote the abode of the dead, or the grave. "Hell" (Anglo-Saxon) corresponds with the word hole; a place for refuse; theologically, the place of final punishment for the wicked.

H. P., Franklinville, N. C. Was the apostle Paul ever married?

At the age of thirty, he was a member of the Sanhedrin (Acts 26:10); as such he "gave his vote" against the followers of Jesus. Being the youngest of the judges, he was appointed "judicial witness" of the execution of Stephen. According to Maimonides, and the Jerusalem Gemara, it was required of all who were to be made members of that Council that they should be married, and fathers of families, because such were supposed to be more inclined to merciful judgment. See Life of St. Paul, by Conybeare and Howson, vol. 1, chap. 2.)

W. W. H., Jackson Springs, N. C. 1. What is the name of the bright star in the southwest now in the evening? 2. Also, the name of our morning star now? 3. Where is Mars at this season of the year?

1. It is the planet Venus. 2. Jupiter is our morning star, and will continue to be such for several weeks. 3. Mars is following Venus across the sky, about four hours behind. These are their positions on and about December 8.

G. L. L., Unionville, Tenn. Did Paul ever see Christ in the flesh, or in a vision?

The passage from I. Cor. 15:8, also that in II. Cor. 12:2, both refer to the same experience, viz., Jesus' appearance to Paul on the way to Damascus. The New Testament narrative clearly shows this to have been a vision, in which the Lord appeared to Saul as a living person, and spoke to him so that his words were understood. That it was a vision Paul himself implies in the second passage referred to; yet that he was justified in regarding it as no hallucination, but a veritable divine reality, is confirmed by the passage in Acts 9:17, where Ananias, the disciple, told Paul that he, too, knew of the latter's wonderful experience and how he had been sent by the Lord Jesus to restore Paul's sight.

E. A. R., Shelburn, Vt. Where in the Bible does it tell of the brother or brothers of our Saviour, Jesus Christ? Did he have more than one?

Matt. 12:46; Matt. 13:55; and corresponding passages in the other Evangelists (see any Reference Bible); also Acts 1:14 and I. Cor. 9:5.

M. B., Phillipsburg, Mo. 1. Can you please tell me what the President's salary is? 2. If the President and the Vice-President die, and the Secretary of State takes the President's place, if he dies will his Secretary of State, or another member of the Cabinet, take his place?

1. The President receives $75,000 per year. 2. If the Vice-President dies, he is succeeded by the Secretary of State. If he dies, his Secretary of State would not succeed him, but the Secretary of War, and so down through the Cabinet, in an order prescribed by act of Congress.

W. O. H., Rushville, Ind., writes: "Christian inconsistency is the weapon that is used by unbelievers against the church with greatest effect. It is unfortunate for the church that it has a large per cent. of Sunday Christians—those whose deeds and actions six days of the week belie their professions. Those who are prominent in certain phases of Christian work frequently display qualities that are sadly wanting in Christian virtue. Too often this seeming religious enthusiasm, sifted down, is at bottom only a desire for display and public recognition. The missionary idea in religion is the highest stage of Christian thought. Those who participate in this work ought to be our best type of Christian manhood and womanhood. The missionary spirit is the crowning attitude of the church. Many good men and many good women are devoting their lives to the missionary cause, and we wish to give all praise to the conscientious workers in this field of endeavor; but it is a pathetic fact that many get into this responsible field and bring reproof upon the religion which they misrepresent in action and deed. A good example of this sort of Christian may be found in the missionary lady who grew indignant and poured out her wrath upon the editor of a certain paper because he failed to make mention of a certain missionary meeting in which she was to participate. Real Christian virtue is made of finer stuff than this."

Mrs. E. E., Scituate, R. I. What would be a good course of reading for one who has only a common school education and who wishes to gain more knowledge in that way?

It would be wise to get a good outline history of English literature, such as Shaw's New History of English and American Literature, as a general guide, and then read the great standard authors, such as Walter Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, of the British writers; then Hawthorne, Longfellow and Lowell, of the American writers. In this way a taste for good literature will be cultivated, and with the outline of literature as a guide it will be easy to pick out others which will broaden the reader's mental horizon. In reading the works of a good historical writer it is well to look up the events referred to and in this way one gains a surprising amount of historical knowledge with comparatively little effort. One should also keep in touch with at least two first-class magazines.

J. A. Y., Hammondsport, Ind. Please give a brief sketch of Mr. Pinchot, the Chief Forester at Washington, who has played such a prominent part in the recent land controversy.

Gifford Pinchot, the Chief Forester, was born in Simsbury, Conn., August 11, 1865. He is the son of James W. Pinchot, a well-known merchant. He studied forestry at Yale, in Germany, Switzerland, France and Austria. Began forestry work in the United States in 1892. In 1898 became Chief of the Bureau of Forestry. Has been connected with numerous national commissions.

T. S. C., Clyde, Tex. 1. How old was Paul when converted, and how old when he died? 2. At what date did he start to Rome, and when did he reach Rome?

1. According to the best chronological authorities, Paul was thirty years old at the period of the martyrdom of Stephen, 36 A.D.; his journey to Damascus was made in the following year; 68 A.D. is given as the date of his martyrdom, hence he must have been sixty-two years old then. 2. Presumably the question refers to Paul's second visit to Rome. The date of his first visit to Rome, in which he made acquaintance with those mentioned in Rom. 16, is not known. His second voyage to Rome (Acts 27) was begun in the autumn of 60 A.D.; arriving in Rome in the spring of 61 A.D. He left Rome in the year 67, was again arrested at Nicopolis in 68, and was sent to Rome, where he suffered martyrdom the same year, under Galba, the Roman Emperor. See "Chronological Tables" by Archbishop Ussher, Dr. William Hales and Dr. S. G. Green.

Mrs. H. L. S., Richmond, Va. Was General Grant of English descent?

General Grant had both English and Scotch blood in his veins. The first member of the Grant family in America to which he belonged was a Scotchman, who settled in New England early in the seventeenth century.

B. R., Wilton, N. H. 1. Please give the composition of German silver. 2. Is it a soft or hard metal?

1. German silver is sometimes called nickel silver. Its composition is variable. The most usual is six parts of copper, three of zinc, and one of nickel. As it tarnishes easily, it is usually electroplated. 2. It is a white, tough metal, taking a good polish. It has a high electrical resistance, and is much used in the making of scientific instruments.

R. McK., Brockport, N. Y. When did forks first come into use?

The use of forks for table use is first found in an old manuscript of 1379 A.D., in connection with the household of the Duke of Burgundy. Forks were first used in England in the reign of James I., about 1607. The table fork came into use after articles of similar design had been used for other purposes, such as hay forks and war forks. The first table forks bore a striking resemblance to the latter.

Mrs. L. A., Lexington, Ky. 1. Please explain Rev. 22:2. 2. John 9:31. 3. I. Sam. 28:7, 8. 4. Who were the twelve baptized (Acts 19:7)?

1. Draw parallel between Rev. 22:2 and Gen. 2:10-14. The "tree of life" appears in both narratives; the Gospel "tree of life" bears fruit continuously; in the earthly paradise, Adam did not eat of the tree of life, so death came into the world, but eternal life is in the Gospel, therefore, "for the healing of the nations." 2. John 9:31. The difficulty here lies in the Levitical interpretation of the word "sinner"; it meant one cast out of the synagogue, so debarred from the privileges of public worship. Contrast the believer's new faith in latter portion of the verse. 3. The woman was evidently one who professed by use of certain incantations to have communion with the world of spirits. Most ancient religions recognized such persons, but among the Israelites this practice was strictly forbidden by the Levitical law. The woman was evidently practising her profession secretly. Lest a visit from the king should terrify her, or suggest to her how to answer him, Saul went by night and foolishly thought to disguise himself, but his stature betrayed him. 4. No record remains; their names have disappeared from reliable history.

L. S. S., Hunter's Creek, Mich. How is the name of Lieutenant Peary pronounced?

It is pronounced "Peer-y."

H. B. H., Centralia, Wash. Please explain Luke 14:26.

Following the best linguists and lexicographers, the word in the original Greek, which in our version is translated "hate," ought to be understood in a comparative sense; therefore meaning "regard with less affection," or "love less," or "esteem less." In the same sense read Matt. 5:44.

The Canot Automobile Entering a Stream

THE Canot Automobile has been officially adopted by the French War Office. While the amphibious automobile is not altogether a new idea, the machine invented by M. Ravailler, a noted engineer, is the first vehicle of the kind to be officially adopted by any government for military or other purposes. It is believed that the machine, which has been handed over to the first regiment of engineers, at Versailles, by the French War Office, will be of great value in scouting, and in various other ways; for instance, for taking a line across a stream so that a temporary rope "bridge," like that made possible by the rocket-apparatus, may be fixed. The car has a fourteen-horse-power engine; can surmount banks that are at an angle of forty degrees; has a road speed of about forty kilometres an hour, and a speed afloat of from ten to twelve kilometres an hour. The transmission of the driving power from the wheels to the propeller, and vice versa, is as quick as it is simple.

Subscriber, Tecumseh. We do not know of any firm that will educate a boy as an engineer to secure his services. They can get graduates of technical schools without this preliminary expense. There is no set civil engineer's salary. Some men start at $50 a month, and some experienced men, with reputations for work done, receive several thousand a year. The Institute of Technology, Boston; the Polytechnic at Troy, N. Y.; the Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, and the Stevens Institute, Hoboken, N. J., are good engineering schools. There are many others.

R. H. N., Shade Gap, Pa. Justification is the act of God and has ever been so, under both the Old and New Dispensations. Under the Old, those were accepted who rendered a faithful and willing obedience; thus we read, in Gal. 3:6, that Abraham believed God, and this belief (i. e., faith) was accounted to him for righteousness. Under the New Dispensation, Jesus "came to bring life and immortality to light," that is, to give us a spiritual illumination which would disclose to man the great scheme of redemption ordained from the beginning. The contention, therefore, that none save those who are in the New Dispensation can attain immortality is untenable. Besides, the evidence of Scripture itself is against such a conclusion. Moses and Elijah were seen at the transfiguration. Paul held that while the race, as a whole, died in Adam's sin, as a whole it received life through Christ's redemptive work.

A Sweet and Lovable Baby

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received the premium, The Story Bible, and am very well pleased with it. I have always been a great admirer of Mrs. Sangster, and I look forward with great pleasure to the reading of it. The "Dreamland" calendar is very beautiful, and I hope to have it framed. The baby is so sweet and lifelike, and the "Daughters of Dorcas" is also very pretty, for all of which I thank you. Hoping for the continued success of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, ANNIE M. FOULDS.

THE STRAWBERRY HANDKERCHIEF

A TALE OF COLONIAL DAYS IN OLD NEW YORK

BY

VIRGINIA, in her white draperies, seemed the vision of a pure soul clothed in the mystery and beauty of the flesh. In her hands there was one of those long, narrow bottles holding its precious hundred drops of attar of roses. It had strange golden characters on its flat sides, and she was wondering what they had to say. The pleasant speculation was in her bending face, and a faint, delicious odor encompassed her.

"Oh! Oh! Oh!" cried Rose, as she entered the room in a flurry of silk and gauze and drooping ostrich plumes. "Oh, Virginia, it is the scent of heavenly roses, of roses gathered in Paradise! I am faint with their sweetness. Where did you get such perfection?"

"Captain De Vries brought me six vials of it from China. He said they came from Cashmere. I will give you one of them. Why have you not come earlier?"

"La! It is only nine o'clock, Virginia. I assure you that I have put the Colden's house arrangements at sixes and sevens to get me here at this housemaid hour."

"Of the hour I was not thinking, Rose. It is five days since I saw you. Poor Arent has been counting the minutes!"

"How unprofitable!"

"He loves you so much, Rose."

"Pshaw! Tell Arent to make himself easy. Love is a common calamity; better people than Arent and I have endured it."

"Do you really care for him? Ever so little do you care for him, Rose?"

"If I were asleep, I might dare to tell you how much."

"Oh, Rose!"

"I will make to you a little confession—among all the incense offered me, I like best the straight words of our dear handsome Arent."

"And if he saw you now, he would lose his heart over again. You are more beautiful than ever."

"It is the fine clothes, Virginia. Really, I am the same dark midget as before. Look at my high heels, they make me two inches taller; this purple silk, with its golden gauze trimmings, gives me a royal air; and this hat, with its scarlet poppies and plumes, suits my black hair better than anything—except perhaps a jeweled crown. Look at them, Virginia," and she danced into the middle of the room, and stood in the white place fluttering on her tiptoes, like some splendid tropical bird.

"You are as beautiful as a——"

"It is the dress. Oh, what would I give to be really as beautiful as men think I am! This morning, when I went out to my chair, the silly carrier fellows lost their heads. They could neither move nor speak, but stood gazing at me with open mouths, as if they had seen a vision. This is, however, but one of my gowns. Will it do for the race? Will it make a sensation? Will that pink of perfection, Joris Artaveldt, approve it? I am all wretchedness until he nods his head."

"And Arent?"

"I should be lovely to Arent in a linsey kirtle and a cotton neckerchief."

"What did the Coldens think of your dresses?"

"They have had fevers of admiration, and chills of envy. I have persuaded them to copy this costume, and one of blue crêpe. I told them they would look enchanting in them, and they swallowed my words like cream. Poor girls!"

"But why poor?"

"They are so little sought after. They have been reduced to relapsing into learning and philosophy and works of charity, and such virtuous accomplishments. You know what kind of men they attract, Virginia?"

"Will they be at the race?"

"With all their hearts they would like to be there, but his excellency rails at such folly. He scoffs at the men who are planning treason and rebellion and who at the same time are making bets on Artaveldt's pony."

Virginia laughed. "Pony?" she queried.

"That is what he called the lovely Corisande. I must not forget to tell Joris. Miss Colden kindly defended the New York men. She said, 'They are so many-sided, sir; and you are used to follow one subject straight to its close.'"

"Do you think one subject is Doctor Colden's way, Rose? I do not. Is he not supposed to be perfect in philosophy, science, diplomacy, music, theology, and what not?"

"He is absurdly perfect. I suppose he learned one of these things at a time, and followed it straight to its complete knowledge. At present he is studying rebellion, and let me tell you, he finds it a confounding subject. But really, Virginia, I long to talk of love and the dear frivolities a little. I am exhausted with conversations about art, and taste, the beau monde, and all that. Let us be natural, and selfish, and a little improper. I have not spoken about a young man for nearly a week. Is it forbidden to ask after the handsome Arent and the fascinating Joris Artaveldt? Or if I tell you about my new gowns, and coats, and palarenes, shall I be in danger of fire or sword?"

"Fire and sword! What do you mean, Rose?"

"The Governor told us very seriously that the people of Nineveh and Sodom doubtless dressed gorgeously, and made bets, and went to races, and got married, with the Persians and fire at their gates. The inference was that the New Yorkers will be doing the same things, when the implacable, conquering English bring fire and ruin to New York. Shall we give our minds to the young men or the new gowns?"

"The gowns, by all means. If you have any finer than the one you are wearing, tell me about it."

"Ah! I had forgotten—I have brought one of the latest fribbles for your acceptance;" and she rose and lifted her bag, a trifle of satin to match her gown, wonderfully adorned with butterflies worked in small iridescent beads. "Look at this, Virginia," and she took out of it a small parcel carefully folded; but retaining it in her hand, said, "First of all, I must tell you how it came to be such a mad fashion as it is."

"I am glad there is a story about it. Is it something to wear?"

"Listen, and then you shall look. There is now in London a wonderful actor, whose name is Garrick, and he has set the city wild with a tragedy of Mr. Shakespeare's called 'Othello.' I never read it; have you?"

"No. I have heard of it, I think; the name seems familiar."

"That is true and strange. Shakespeare always seems familiar. I wonder how that should be."

"Ask Doctor Colden."

"Not for a thousand tragedies. I should never like Shakespeare again. Well, Virginia, in this play of Othello, a handkerchief embroidered with strawberries is a love gift, and though it made a deal of trouble, all the lovers in London affected a Strawberry Handkerchief. Even in the very respectable court of the great George and Charlotte, the Strawberry Handkerchief was so evident that the King asked the reason for it. And the notion delighted his Majesty, and he gave Queen Charlotte a square of cobweb cambric wondrously wrought with strawberries. My Aunt Portman has sent me two made after the Queen's pattern, and I have brought you one of them. Now look at it."

Then Virginia unfastened the thin silver cord, and took from within the parcel a square of finest cambric. Round it was a wreath of small strawberry leaves, and in each corner, amid the leaves, a little bunch of ripe, red strawberries. "It is beyond comparison!" she cried; "it is most exquisite! What shall I do with it? How shall I wear it?"

"The gentlemen pass their handkerchiefs through the topmost button of their dress coats; the ladies wear them at their belt. My aunt tells me all London must be in love, for everybody wears a Strawberry Handkerchief. In fact, people fall in love in order to be in the fashion. Lord Ely gave his lady one, and she has quashed her divorce intentions. The Marquis of Warrendon gave the rich Miss Hastings one, and the next day he was wearing her favor; and people say that the lovely Lady Linley let hers fall at the feet of the Duke of Andover, and received it back with the offer of his hand and heart and dukedom. Indeed, the tales are numerous and romantic, and the Strawberry Handkerchief is a most convincing proof of the naturally affectionate disposition of the English people."

"And will the fashion stand?"

"As the King follows it, the fashion will last as long as the very ugly but exceedingly good queen wears his token. One of her virtues is constancy—the handkerchief has prospects."

"What will you do with yours? Will you wear it, Rose?"

"No. I cannot marry my aunt, and

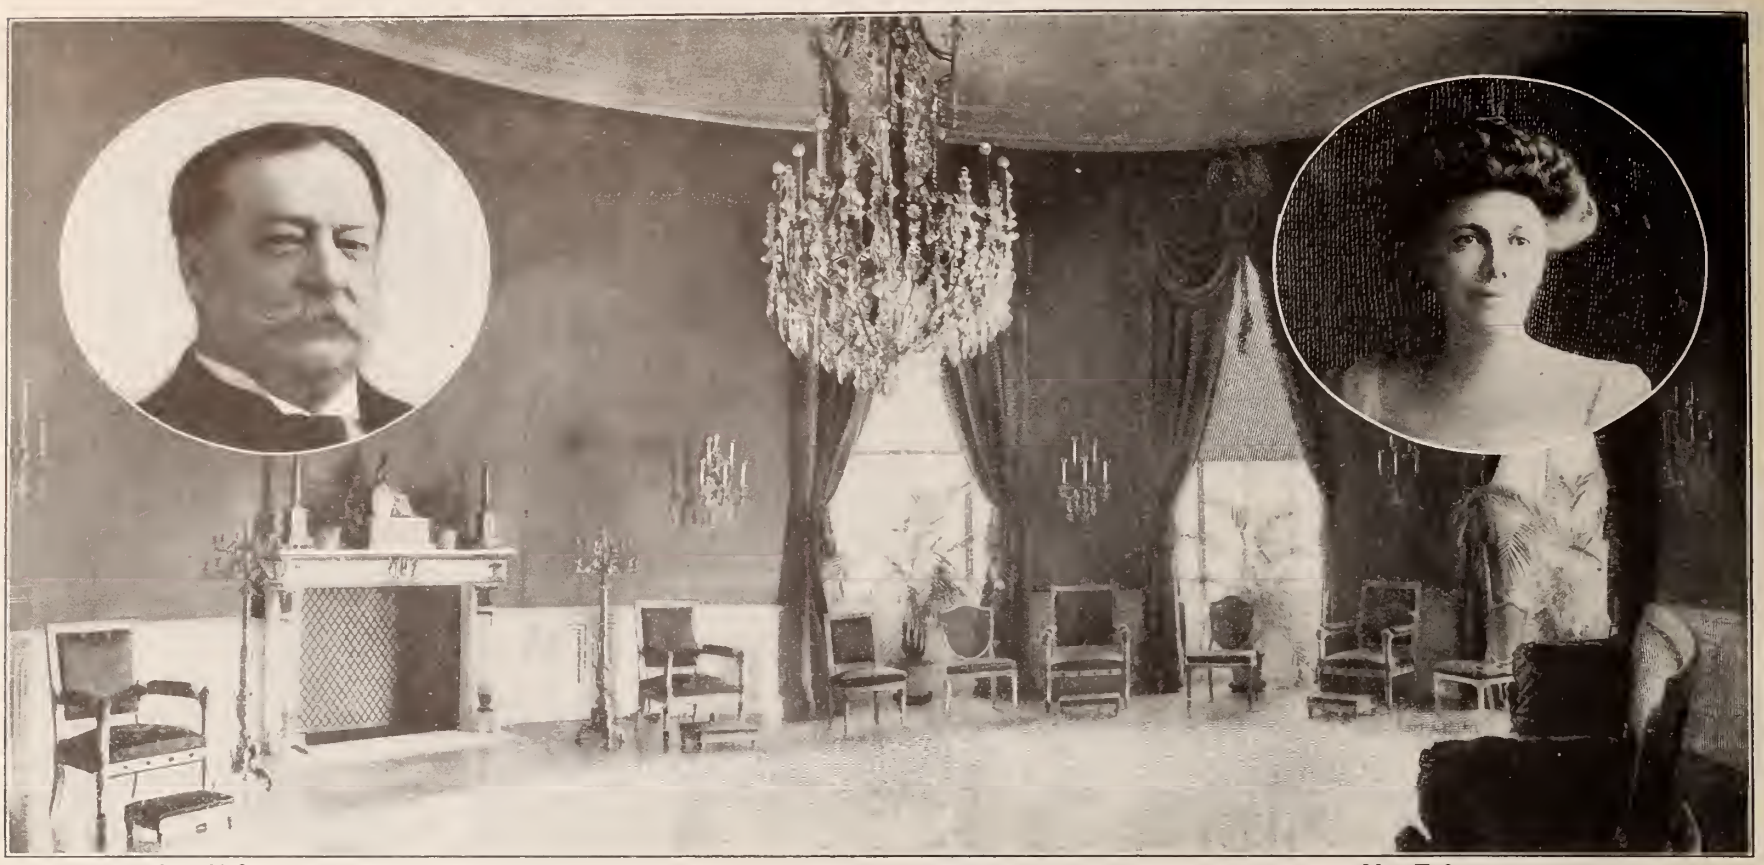
New Year's Day Plans at the White House



President Taft (Copyright Baker Art Gallery) Copyright by Waldon Fawcett Mrs. Taft (Copyright Harris & Ewing)

THE HISTORIC "BLUE ROOM" IN THE WHITE HOUSE, WHERE THE NEW YEAR'S RECEPTION IS HELD

THE "social season" in Washington opens nominally with the assembling of Congress. In reality, it blooms fully only with the White House reception on New Year's Day. This is always one of the most beautiful functions of the winter. The great conservatories, into which one enters from a back door of the Executive Mansion, are rifled for choicest flowers with which to decorate every room. Palms and ferns add their touch of summer green here and there, and the ladies appear in their freshest toilettes.

It is truly the President's reception. He and his wife are supposed to be receiving alone, though, in point of fact, the wives of Cabinet ministers and other ladies assist. They stand in line in the oval-shaped "Blue Room," perhaps the most beautiful of the White House parlors, in its furnishings of pale blue and gold.

From eleven in the morning until half-past one, or later, the procession of guests files by. First comes the Supreme Court in a body, headed by the Chief Justice. Then approach the members of the Diplomatic Corps, most of them far more stately and distinguished in manner than our plain citizens, and dazzling in their uniforms, decorations and orders.

The officers of the Army and Navy rival them, however, in their gay, full-dress uniforms, as they come next in the line.

More soberly clad, Senators and Representatives and other officials follow them, and then comes the motley crowd of the "general public," rich and poor, small and great. Each one enjoys a handshake with the President and his wife, then passes on into the Red Room and beyond. Occasionally one hears a stranger say, "My father went to school with your father," or "I knew you when you were a baby. Did you ever hear your mother speak of Miss Sally Sparks?" and other quaint and intimate speeches. Sometimes upon hearing one, the face of the President lights up and his set, conventional smile falls off like a mask. It is a sight worth seeing.

Never have a more cordial and socially accomplished host and hostess presided over the White House than President and Mrs. Taft. The coming New Year's reception there may confidently be expected to prove one of the most successful in its history.

you cannot marry the Lady Rose Harley. We must keep them in scent and seclusion until we find lovers on whom to bestow them. For my part, I may cast the handkerchief at the feet of Arent—or Joris."

Then Virginia suddenly rose, and going to a cabinet locked her treasure within it. She was troubled by the mention of Joris, and uncertain as to what she ought to do. Over the refractory drawer that was so difficult to lock she lingered as long as possible, but when she returned to her seat she saw the suspicion and the question in Rose's face:

"You ran away at the name of Joris; tell me why you did so? Tell me without disguise, Virginia."

"I have promised to marry him."

"Gramercy! A pretty account you give of yourself. You ought to have warned me long ago. Pray let me offer you my good wishes. I did not know—I did not suspect——"

"Dear Rose, I did not know myself until three days ago. I was astonished."

"You ought not to have been. Pray let me tell you what an enchanting creature you are. Sure, our young soldier could not help his adoration."

"Rose!"

"Oh, I will not spare your modesty. Chaste stars! What sweet words and kissing there must have been. It confounds me to see how easily girls learn love. Oh, I am ashamed for myself as well as others. I am in the like transgression."

"Indeed, dear Rose, I——"

"I will spare your confessions, Virginia. With all my soul I am glad for you. And it is a mercy that I am not the least in love with Joris Artaveldt. I never found him comparable to Arent. It is strange, but I have always had the good fortune, in every company, to pick out the best of the beaus for myself—make me thankful for so much intelligence. My! what would I give to be engaged—I mean a month, a week, a day, just to learn how it feels. It makes a change. I saw, rather I felt it in you at once, Virginia."

"Why do you not get engaged? You have a dozen lovers waiting on you. There is young Maryn Keyser."

"I would not trust him unless he was key-cold dead."

"Captain Godschalls?"

"He is like a baby's whistle, any one can play on him."

"Harry Percival?"

"He is a gambler beyond all intelligence. He casts the dice for every event. He would forget his wedding day unless he had a bet on it. I would not touch his hand, he shakes his elbow too constantly."

"The young curate of Trinity then?"

"He is an angel. But he is always talking about his flock. He might regard me as one of his sheep. Do I look like an amiable sheep delighting to follow and obey the shepherd? No, Virginia, I could not behave properly in a flock. I should lead it into mischief."

"Captain Reginald Beauchamp?"

"He fricassees everything he says with French and Italian. I do not understand him. Faith, he might give me orders in French, or scold me in Italian, and I could not talk back. In my own language, I can speak for myself, but I will take no chances with a man possessed of three languages; it wouldn't be a fair wrangle at all."

"Arent? I am sure you like Arent."

"Perhaps I do, perhaps I don't; perhaps 'tis time enough yet for me; but for all that, and all that, I swear we won't marry. I tell you soberly, I will not think of marriage until I am my own mistress."

"Then in a year?"

"I may make a fool of myself—if it is so written. Let us talk of your marriage. Does the path of true love run straight for you? What do the fathers say?"

"We have told no one. We thought it the best way at present."

"Yet you may take my word for it, this way will end in some lively scrapes. And pray do you think every one will be as blind as you wish them to be?"

"They might. You never suspected Joris of being in love with me."

"Let me tell you, Virginia, that people are not always asleep when their eyes are shut. It sometimes happens that I shut my eyes that I may see. Come, let us talk about our gowns, and coats, and hats, for of all the cant that is canted in this canting world, lovers' opinions and lovers' vows are the silliest."

"I am almost sure that you yourself are in love, Rose, and I count it much to your credit."

"Well, while I have meat and drink, love will not starve me; and I do wish it was dinner time. I am mortally hungry, and if there should happen to be a damson roll on the table, all the lovers in the world would be out of my reckoning. What are you going to wear this afternoon? I hope you will not outshine me."

"Joris wishes me to wear my light-blue frock. I have retrimmed it with silver lace and buttons. I shall neither disgrace nor outshine you, Rose."

Then the conversation settled itself on gowns and millinery, and seeing that the fashion of these things is now one hundred and fifty years out of style and date, we need not take thought about them. And presently the bell rang for dinner.

The Old Year and the New

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Hail, Nineteen Hundred and Ten!

HOW fast the century is moving on! Already we must change the date on our letters to nineteen hundred and ten. Quickly the years and the decades will slip by, and we old folks will pass with them. And not only the aged, but the young; for there are very few who are living now who will be able to take a great deal of interest in A.D. 2000. Little folk in the cradles to-day may be great-grandparents then. They will assuredly have had their bloom of youth, their noonday success and their gentle eventide, and be old people waiting for the journey's end when that time comes. Two thousand seems a long way off. Probably at that era airships will have superseded some of our present methods of travel, and motor-cars, let us hope, have ceased to be continual menaces to pedestrians. If the twentieth century will but set about it, there are several improvements it may make, of which those who come after us shall reap the benefit. When railway trains cease to clamor and shriek; when noise is eliminated from thoroughfares and clouds of smoke are not permitted to obscure the brightness of the sun; when the labor of men in mines is safeguarded, the white plague exterminated, and the conditions of tenement living made hygienic, the twentieth century will deserve a laurel wreath and a proud position in the Hall of Fame. During its first decade the world has lost some of its finest and most prominent men. There is not a department of the world's work from which laborers have not been taken by the hand of death. In our country, and in other countries, there have been gaps in the ranks, gaps that are at once filled, for though the workers die the work goes on.

Well for us all if our desire is, with Horatius Bonar, to be only remembered by what we have done. No one is missed very long, except by the hearts of a few. It behooves us to "live justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly before God," seeing that our hold upon this earthly life is uncertain. Nevertheless, the humblest life is not lived in vain. We shall live in those who will succeed us. Let us hope that they will not repeat our failures, and that they will build firmly on the foundations we leave for them. Every century in the past has given its contribution to the twentieth, and every century in the future will owe the twentieth a debt.

All hail, Nineteen hundred and ten! Perhaps none of us can do any better, as we salute the New Year, with its manifold chances of happiness, than to say what the young Princess Victoria said when she was told the greatness of her destiny. She was to be a queen, and large responsibilities were to be laid upon her. Lifting her sincere eyes to the grave men who talked with her, she said, very simply, "I will be good." The best that any of us can do or say is included in that little phrase.

Rudyard Kipling, who is the real laureate of England though not the actual incumbent, strikes a true note in "L'Envoi":

And those that were good shall be happy; they shall sit in a golden chair;
They shall splash at a ten-league canvas with brushes of comet's hair;
They shall find real saints to draw from—Magdalene, Peter and Paul;
They shall work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all.
And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star, Shall draw the Thing as He Sees It for the God of Things as They Are.

GRANDMOTHER READS TO HIM

Far from his playthings, far from the day,
Grandmother wafts her boy away—
Off to the princess of ages past,
In a land by perils overcast.

She turns the pages, and lo, he sees
Wonderful rescues, if you please;
And over his eyes comes a dreamy look
As grandmother reads the fairy-book.

Good Housekeeping

Suppose yourself suddenly called upon to speak in meeting. You are asked to define good housekeeping. What is your opinion on the subject? Is the good housekeeper the one whose windows and window furnishings are always at the highest pitch of spotlessness? Is her sideboard so bright that its polish gleams like a mirror? Are her floors first swept with a broom and then gone over with a carpet-sweeper and a damp cloth, while every article of furniture in every room is pulled out of its place every Thursday or Friday, when the weekly cyclone takes place? Does good housekeeping consist in beating the rugs every week, in dusting all the books on all the shelves, one by one, so frequently that the time for reading them is singularly brief? Would you say that good housekeeping means having pantry shelves groaning with preserves and pickles? Is that to be called good housekeeping which makes a housewife so hard to please that she cannot possibly keep a maid more than a month, and that she is known at times to have engaged and dismissed fourteen cooks in a winter?

Or would you possibly say that good housekeeping is not entitled to be mentioned if limited to the above descriptions? Can there be good housekeeping that is not good home-making? An untidy house is a poor setting for a happy home, but ought the home to be sacrificed to the house? What do you think?

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—AMY G. In writing to a widow address her as Mrs. Mary Loomis or Mrs. John Loomis, according to her preference. Either way is correct. In these days, custom favors the latter usage.

—ANNA D. A little book by Alice K. Fallows, entitled A Talk About Relaxation, would exactly meet your need. It is published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.

—R. S. V. P. These familiar alphabetical symbols simply mean that an answer is required when they are appended to a formal invitation. It is equally good form to have this request engraved in English, the letters mentioned being the initials of French words.

Making Home Beautiful

IF the ordinary home-builder would take counsel of some capable and intelligent woman, of good taste and domestic instincts or experience, regarding interior arrangement before asking an architect to submit an exterior design he would often save the latter a lot of trouble. If the architect happened to be an artist, she would probably give him an inspiration or two.

It is "better late than never" to take such a woman into your house when the floors are being penciled for the partitions. Upon looking at the markings she will almost at once suggest certain changes which would add to the convenience or help produce effects. And almost invariably she will be heard to regret that this had not been a little wider there, and a trifle deeper here, and perhaps a somewhat different arrangement or position of this angle or that bay. About that time you will be filled with a good many regrets yourself, and the chief one will be that you hadn't obtained her practical and artistic ideas before your plans were made.

Suppose, for instance, that she desires certain effects in a hallway, staircase and fireplace combination. She conceives a picture and presents or describes it to you, and you pencil-sketch it in the first floor plan. Just ask that bright, enthusiastic, but thoughtful, tasteful and practical young woman to fill out the remainder of some such plan, being careful to look out for the requirements of the second floor and for outer and inner access to the cellar. Get an idea or two from her regarding attic entrance, bay windows, piazza and balconies, then go to your artist architect and get him to build an outside design around these conceptions, and to consistently perfect your floor plan sketch. If he is up to his business, and this queen of the household is up to the estimation I've here formed of her, though he may materially change and improve on your crude notions and designs, he will get her ideas in there, and you will be glad of it.

A Word About Susie

Yes, a word about Susie and another about Jimmie. They are active, healthy children, and it is not to be expected that they will get through many days of the week without accidents to clothing that are more or less trying to the mother whose hands are full. When Susie comes in from school with a great splash of ink on the front of a clean dress, or Jimmie reveals a woful rent in the knees of his long stockings, it is little wonder that the mother feels annoyed. Let her think back to her own childhood. Did she never, in those happy days that she loves to recall, have the misfortune to spatter her dress with ink, and were not her brothers, Tom and Phil, who are dignified gentlemen now, rather in the habit then of tearing trousers and jackets quite as her boy does?

A mother should be careful not to find fault unsparingly about accidents, even if they are due to heedlessness. Sometimes mothers visit more severely upon a luckless child the disaster of a broken dish than they do a fit of ill-temper, or a profane word, or an act of deceit. Stains on the soul and damages to character are far worse than injuries to frocks or accidents to furniture.

Think of Susie and Jimmie as children to-day, who will be young people to-morrow, and who the day after to-morrow will be in the thick of the fight precisely as parents are to-day. You have your opportunity to teach these children by example, by patience, self-control and sweetness, and above all by a right sense of values you can do the very best for your daughter and your son. Doesn't it strike you that the experiment is worth trying?

The Temptation of Jesus

By Mrs. M. Baxter

NOTHING manifests the love of God more than the tests to which he puts us. That he takes such trouble with our education shows how dear we must be to him. It is not in the moments when we are full of elevating spiritual experiences that we are really the nearest to our Lord in spirit; but just when everything seems to go wrong, when it seems as though faith, and love, and patience were at the utmost tension, it is then that he is giving us fellowship with his sufferings, and bringing us into conformity with his death, as we are enabled to say to him, "Yes, Lord," under all circumstances. He was "tempted in all points like as we are," and allows us, in our measure, to be tempted in all points like as he was. But "in that he hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted" (Heb. 4:15, Heb. 2:18).

Satan is a coward; he attacked Eve, the weaker one, when Adam was not at hand to help her, and he attacked the Son of Man when he was weak with fasting, and with the tremendous strain of the forty days' temptation. Our Lord knew at that moment what it is to meet the greatest temptations and difficulties in a time of physical weakness, when one feels unable for anything. And the temptation was apparently such a natural one. "If you are the Son of God, use your divine power for your present necessities; your health, your very life, demands it." But the Lord Jesus was on earth, and in the desert, too, at God's disposal, not at his own, and certainly not at Satan's; and his reply was conclusive. There is something more necessary than bread even for the hungry. "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." There is life-power for our whole being in the Word of God. It creates, for "He spake and it was done, he commanded, and it stood fast" (Ps. 33:9). It heals, for "He sent his Word and healed them" (Ps. 107:20). It converts, it makes wise, it rejoices the heart, it enlightens the eyes (Ps. 19:7, 8). It quickens spirit, soul and body.

They are to be pitied who do not drink in the Word of God every morning before they take an earthly meal; nothing so invigorates, nothing so prepares for the day as a time, if only half an hour, alone with God's Word and in prayer. It can almost always be had by getting up earlier; and the small loss of sleep is made up for in a heart strengthened for the day, a will poised, a conscience clear, an outlook formed from communion with him from whom no secrets are hid, and then a "peace which passeth all understanding," as every coming difficulty, known and unknown, is put into the hands of infinite Love and Wisdom, and one enters on the battle of life at his disposal, for whatever may happen. "It is written;" something that God has said is such a stand-by through the day. Practically God's children do live by everything which proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

The foiled enemy did not give in after his first rebuff, and came with a bolder tone than before, even quoting Scripture—but mutilated. "He taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down; for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone."

Worth Many Times Its Cost

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Premiums duly received, for which I send my hearty thanks. Such useful information as was gleaned from the medical work, Before the Doctor Comes, has saved many times its cost already, proving your wisdom in such selections for your Christian Herald family.

Some sweet day the end shall come
To our parting and our pain.
Some sweet day we'll all go home,
Nevermore to part again.

Some sweet hour our mortal frame
Shall His glorious image wear.
Some sweet hour our worthless name
All His majesty shall share.

Some sweet day our tongue shall tell
All the story of His love.
Some sweet day our song shall swell
Loud and sweet as songs above.

Some sweet morn we'll see His face,
And we shall be satisfied.
Some sweet day in His embrace
We shall evermore abide.

THE CHEERFUL HEART

WHETHER the world be bright or dark,
Depends on how we take it,
Much of the misery we know
Is just because we make it.

If on the windows of the soul
We let self's cobwebs gather,
We may be sure all through our lives
We'll see much cloudy weather.

A cheerful heart and willing hands
To do kind deeds for others
Will make the people whom we meet
All seem like friends and brothers.

Just try it, you who think the world
By joy and hope forsaken;
And I am sure that you will find
That you have been mistaken.

Gov. Hughes' Father Dead

THE Rev. David C. Hughes, D.D., father of Governor Hughes of New York, died in Albany, at the Executive Mansion, on Wednesday, December 16, after a stroke of apoplexy. Dr. Hughes was in his seventy-seventh year, and had been in failing health for some time past. He was for many years a prominent and active figure in the Baptist ministry and was at one time pastor of the Pilgrim Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. He held many other important charges, and even after his retirement from regular pastoral work was welcomed in many pulpits in different parts of the country. Rev. Dr. Hughes was a friend of The Christian Herald and a warm supporter of its varied philanthropies. After a visit to our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, he sent the following cordial letter to Dr. Klopsch:

"130 St. James Street,
"Kingston, N. Y.

"My Dear Friend: I can never forget the joy I experienced when I visited Mont-Lawn. Of all the honors that you have won by your many and world-wide philanthropies your Mont-Lawn Children's Institution will outshine them all. The grandchildren and great-grandchildren of these children who have been beneficiaries of your Christian care will rise and call you blessed.

"God bless you, my beloved brother.
"Cordially, D. C. Hughes."

The Shorthand Classes

ENROLMENTS for the New Year for the Shorthand Correspondence Course Classes are now in order. These classes have now been conducted successfully for the last two seasons, and many hundreds of Christian Herald readers and their friends, young and old, of both sexes, have been numbered among the students. A good reliable shorthand training is given that fits the pupil for practical work, and the total cost to those who join the Classes through The Christian Herald is $2, being less than one-tenth the average class fee charged elsewhere. The system is Pitman-Graham, and is taught in twenty-four graded lessons, weekly or semi-weekly. With reasonable attention it can be acquired by any student without difficulty. This is an opportunity which should be availed of by all who wish to get a good business education which will open the way to well-paid employment.

All stationery is supplied with the lessons. Every lesson is returned to the school for revision and correction. Special care is taken with backward pupils. We quote from a few recent testimonials:

Your Course is excellent. You make each lesson perfectly clear. No one could fail to learn if they follow your instructions. Mrs. M. Dingee, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I can honestly say it is the best Course for the money one could possibly get. Sherman Coates, Lincoln, Ill.

I am perfectly satisfied with the Course, and find it a great help in receiving telephone messages for transmission by telegraph. Richard F. Kern, Reading, Pa.

I liked the Course very much, and thank you for your kindness and patience. E. V. Cooper, Sellersburg, Ind.

I enjoyed the Course very much, and certainly think that I got my money's worth. Ruth Ranger, Northport, Mich.

Over 1,200 pupils have completed the twelve weeks' course during the year. Those who desire to join the Classes should send full name and address, with special rate enrolment fee ($2), (no extras) to The Christian Herald, 92 Bible House, New York City.

Prettiest Calendar Sent Out

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The calendar "Dreamland" and the picture "Daughters of Dorcas" have just been received, and we wish to thank you for them. The calendar and picture are both beautiful, and we think the calendar the prettiest The Christian Herald has ever sent out.

How to Make Our Will God's*

MEEKNESS is not a fashionable virtue. Perhaps it is right to say that courage and charity, and generosity and some others, are fashionable virtues. Practise them and the world will applaud you. Not so with meekness. The lowly and the poor in spirit are generally regarded with contempt, and yet many of the choicest of all the Scripture benedictions are pronounced upon the humble.

For instance, what a rare and helpful blessing is that which is promised to the meek in the verse in Psalms which forms part of our lesson! He shall be guided in judgment, he shall be taught the right way to take.

Our great philosophers have declared that judgment is the highest intellectual attribute; that shrewd and clear power of comparison, which chooses from a bewildering array of courses always and ever the right one. The man of good judgment is appealed to in every community for advice on all doubtful matters. Often he saves neighbors from the sharks of the law by settling their disputes out of court.

Thus, in a rural New England community, a certain Jacob Hillman was noted for his clear-sightedness and fine sense of justice. He was a man of property and standing, and had made himself beloved as well as respected. It was a common saying in his native town, "If Jake Hillman says it's so, it's always so."

One could desire no higher tribute from his neighbors; yet to the man who bows to the divine will, and conforms his every act without protest or rebellion to the law of the Lord, it is promised that he shall have this wonderful insight—he shall "know of the doctrine," whether it be of God or of man; and he shall pray, and light shall be shed upon every devious path.

Charles Wagner, for one of his powerful discourses upon faith, chose for his text this passage from Habakkuk: "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what he will say unto me. And the Lord answered me and said, The just shall live by his faith."

It is through faith, and faith only, that we can achieve that perfect meekness which lays aside its own will and desires only to be shown the will of God.

Pastor Wagner illustrates his text by the careers of Luther and Calvin, and those of their followers. They had against them "the jeering and opposition of an ancient routine; the refined wisdom of the new disciples of Greece and Rome, full of contempt for the Gospel of simplicity as preached by untaught fishermen; those who adored the splendor of the arts; and, above all, they had against them the impetuous young disciples," who wished to travel faster than the masters.

But they hearkened unto the voice of the Eternal, laying aside their own wills, listening only to his words, and watching only for the vision he should send.

"By the spirit of faith," continues this great preacher, "we can become not only the inheritors of the steadfastness of our fathers, but the instruments of God. We must set ourselves upon the tower, stand upon our watch, listen to what God says to us. Confide yourselves to God! Convert yourselves from creeds to faith, from men to God—thus shall you learn simple trust and great security."

The bird that soars on highest wing
Builds on the ground her lowly nest;
And she that doth most sweetly sing
Sings in the shade when all things rest;
In lark and nightingale we see
What honor hath humility.

Saving Others*

THE opinion is too often held that we are Christians chiefly in order to save our own souls from sin and death, and that most of our efforts should be devoted to ourselves.

This was, indeed, the burden of the old preaching. Time and thought were required to show us that the main things for each man to do were to turn his face in the right direction, follow hard after Christ, and, as he went, concern himself most of all with the salvation of those beside him. Little by little it has come to us, that while we are praying and struggling to save others we ourselves grow most in grace and knowledge.

It is notable that we are oftenest enjoined to use in the rescue of the unsaved, the spoken word. It is true that practice must go with faith, and that the deed must go with speech; but so much ridicule has been heaped upon talk that perhaps we have deprived it of the high place due to it.

Notice that Philip "spake" before he healed. Jesus opened the book and "read," and then he "began to say unto them," and it was what he said which attracted attention far more than his deeds. Timothy was over and over bidden to "take heed unto the doctrine." It was what they heard—it was Peter's fiery speech—which pricked the hearts of the multitude on the day of Pentecost; while it was what John said which impelled the two disciples to follow Jesus; and Philip spake unto Nathanael, and won him by the word, before Jesus looked into his heart and roused his deeper fealty.

In this practical age it has even been deemed necessary to write whole books to vindicate the value of preaching, so much has the word lost through the modern veneration for the deed.

An inevitable corollary has been the backwardness among us to speak of salvation to those who are not Christians. We gloss over our sin by saying, "I set as good an example as I can. I keep the commandments, and I go to church. If this good example does not affect my friends, it is not likely that weak words would."

There is no fallacy more deceitful than this. The good work should be done, but the rest should not be left undone. As with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, yet with the mouth confession must be made unto salvation; so with our example we must give an object lesson, while not omitting the word of admonition and exhortation.

It is not necessary that one should preach long sermons to his friends. The wise man wrote that "a word fitly spoken"—not a sermon—"is like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

In the rough and unpolished story of Paul Gilbert, the converted "slum-worker," he pictures Gabriel as asking Christ, when he reached heaven, what recognition the world had given of his divine suffering for its sake. Christ replies that only a few in Palestine know of it. Gabriel feels that more ought to know—that the whole world ought to—and he asks, "What is your plan, Master, for telling them of it?"

Jesus is supposed to reply, "I have asked Peter and James, and John and Andrew, and a few others, to make it the business of their lives to tell others, and those others, others, until the last man in the farthest circle has heard the story and has felt the power of it."

"But suppose they do not tell others—what then?" Gabriel asks. And Jesus answers quietly, "Gabriel, I haven't made any other plans—I'm counting on them."

He is counting on us to tell others. That is our great business in the world outside for this new year.

His First New Year

(See Cover Illustration)

MANY and many a strange New Year
Lieth before thee, baby dear.
Soon shall thy small, uncertain feet
Manfully tread the stormy street;
Soon from the sheltering love of home
Far afield shall those footsteps roam.
Dear Saviour, grant to our darling child
The shield of faith in the world so wild,
And bring him down to his last New Year
As pure and white as we see him here.

Called Higher

Mrs. Cecelia Wagner Krudop entered into rest on April 2, 1909, at her home in Whitestone, N. Y. She was a devoted wife and mother.

Dr. A. K. Cox, of Bardstown, Ky., was called higher some time ago, in his eighty-second year. He was long a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Jane W. Sheldon, of New Haven, Conn., died on the 13th of September. She was a great Bible student, and was reading it for the fifty-first time.

On January 11, 1909, Mrs. Mary Horwood fell asleep in Jesus, at the age of ninety-one years. She was born in Newark, O., and united in early girlhood with the Baptist Church.

J. Calvin Ackert, formerly of Rhinebeck, N. Y., passed away at his home in Thomaston, Conn., on February 14, 1909. He was a noble, Christian character and always enjoyed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Died at Canisteo, Stevens County, N. Y., November 12, 1909, Mrs. Mary Dalton Kenwill, in the ninety-third year of her age. Of her family of eleven children six survive to mourn her loss. She was a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years. On coming to the United States she united with the M. E. Church at Johnsburgh, Warren County, N. Y.

If so, let us send you

The Ideal Sight Restorer

for 10 days at our expense.

THE NORMAL EYE

It helps nature in a purely natural way to strengthen the eyes and restore the natural vision. Its action is in the nature of a gentle massage, which stimulates the eyes by restoring the normal circulation of blood—that is all that weak eyes require. But it does more—it molds the eye painlessly but surely to its perfect shape. This is necessary to correct near-sight, far-sight, astigmatism and kindred defects. It is absolutely safe—it does not come in direct contact with the eyes; and five minutes' manipulation in your own home, twice a day, is all that is necessary to counteract eyestrain and headache, and relegate eyeglasses to the rubbish box. Throw away your eyeglasses See nature, and read with your naked eyes. Write for Booklet No 127A and TEN DAYS' TEST, to

Temptation After Baptism*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IF places are rendered sacred by what has occurred there, we must consider the fords of the Jordan, where Jesus was baptized, as one of the most sacred places in the world. There is no shrine there, unless we think of the blue sky and the everlasting hills as forming a shrine. They are the same as when Jesus was there: the same sky through which came the Voice from heaven; the same sentinel-like hills, which formed the background of the baptismal scene. The same river Jordan is there—not the identical drops of water, but the Jordan in which he was baptized. It was an historical spot even when Jesus came there to be baptized of John, for it was at the fords of the Jordan that the Israelites had crossed into the Promised Land, nearly sixteen hundred years before the baptism of Jesus. Now it was to represent the baptismal entrance into the Christian Church.

Jesus made a journey of nearly one hundred miles, from Nazareth to Bethabara, to come to his baptism. He was thirty years of age. There was a significance in his beginning his public work at that age. The priests and Levites were thirty years of age when they began their services in the tabernacle and temple (Num. 4:3). Search the Scriptures and you will find nothing concerning his life from the time he was twelve years old until he was thirty. Visit Nazareth, and you will be shown the traditional house where Jesus is said to have lived, but nothing is surely known concerning what he did during those eighteen years. Evidently Jesus was all those years a close student of the Scriptures, for among his sayings during the three years of his ministry there are recorded quotations from twenty-three out of the thirty-nine books. And if all the things which Jesus said and did had been written, doubtless not one of the thirty-nine books would have been omitted. Let Bible students, with their Bibles, look up these quotations, comparing the Old and New Testaments.

The Baptism of John

John the Baptist, too, knew his Old Testament so well that when his cousin Jesus, of whose wonderful birth he no doubt knew, and whom he knew from that story or in some other way to be the promised Messiah, came forward for baptism with the penitent sinners awakened by his sermons, he said, "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" Jesus answered, "Suffer it now; for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." Baptism signified the washing away of sin and the entrance upon a holy life. If any man thinks he does not need baptism, an open confession of faith, a joining of the church, let him consider that Christ, needing no such ceremony, was baptized as an example, because others would need it, and in all things he desired to be an example of what men should be and do. Jesus underwent baptism with sinners also, no doubt, as a part of his atonement, as one way in which "he was made sin for us, though he knew no sin." Carlo Maratta, in his great painting in Rome of the baptism of Jesus, pictures, as a keen mental crucifixion, the rush of blood to his cheeks and nostrils at the thought that any one could think he, too, like those about him, had stained his soul with sins against heaven and before his Father.

Putting together the story of this event in the four Gospels (Matt. 3:13; Mark 1:9; Luke 3:21; John 1:32) we get a story that should repeat itself after every baptism: "And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway from the water praying; and lo, the heavens were opened unto him; and he and John saw the Spirit of God descending in a bodily form as a dove out of heaven and coming upon him, and it abode upon him; and lo, a voice out of the heavens saying, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased." Baptism of water should with all of us be accompanied with spiritual baptism and clearer vision of God, keener hearing of his words of adoption and direction. It ought to be reason enough for us all to be baptized and make an open confession of faith that Jesus not only gave us his example, and caused it to be recorded four times, but also commanded us to be baptized, one of the commandments of Jesus. That must surely be no less binding than the ten God gave through Moses.

Baptism by the Holy Spirit

A Chinese named Wang, aged sixty-two, applying for baptism, said: "I should not like to die without having obeyed the commandment of the Lord Jesus." When asked what name he intended to choose at his baptism, he said, "Lazarus was a poor man, just as I am a poor man; I should like, therefore, to be called by his name." He was accordingly baptized by the name of Lazarus.

Of course, the water baptism itself will not save us. It is not by "holy water," but by the Holy Spirit that our hearts and lives are purified and strengthened. When John the Baptist had begun his preaching in the wilderness, and when many were baptized of him, confessing their sins, he had said: "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance, but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear; he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

In our studies last year we had a lesson about Paul coming to Ephesus, and finding certain disciples there, as a result of the teachings of Apollos, who, when they were questioned by Paul in regard to their baptism, replied that they had been baptized "unto John's baptism." And they told Paul, "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." Paul soon convinced them that they needed something more than the baptism of repentance received from John. And then Paul baptized them in the name of Jesus, and laid his hands upon them, and the baptism of the Holy Ghost came upon them, and then they spake with tongues and prophesied.

Let us ask ourselves, Are we still in John's baptism? Has baptism meant to us only the washing away of sin? Or perhaps it has been only a form. Dr. Joseph Parker says: "You ought now to be able to enjoy the large, calm, sweet liberty of the Gospel. . . . We are not saved by the outward, but by the inward. The outward is but symbolical; the inward baptism is a shedding abroad in the heart of the Holy Ghost."

After Baptism, Temptation

Those who think that baptism will end temptation, or who confuse temptation with sin, need to study this story of Jesus tempted after baptism:

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

"Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil." It was the wilderness of Judah, a desolate region, fifteen miles in length, lying north of Jerusalem and west of Jericho. It seems never to have had any inhabitants, being rocky and barren, with grass only in patches. It is now infested with beasts and reptiles, as it probably was in the time of Christ. The account of Jesus' temptation in the wilderness is all told in eleven verses (Matt. 4:1-11).

Who but Jesus himself could have told the story of his temptation? There were no eye witnesses, as later on the Mount of Transfiguration, when he had Peter and James and John with him, and the two guests from heaven, Moses and Elias. No, Jesus was found alone on Mount Quarantania. Tradition points out this mountain, twelve to fifteen hundred feet high, rising almost perpendicularly out of the plain, as the scene of the temptation of Christ. Some one suggests "the devil was an eye-witness." There is no indication that he was there until after the "forty days" had passed. The many pictures of the temptation, some of them by great artists, would lead us to think that the devil was there in bodily form, but we are inclined to agree with those who think the devil came as an evil spirit to the mind of Jesus, as he comes to us. Such a creature as we see in the pictures—a black monster, with tail, claws and horns, on a human form, equipped with huge bat-like wings and webbed feet; or as a bearded old man, with fool's cap and clawed hoofs; or as a hideous reptile, peeping forth from a crack in the earth, Jesus Christ would not have parleyed with, nor would we. "Evil suggestion" is, at the same time, the worst form, and most persuasive power, in which the devil can come to any one. And we must believe he came in that way to Christ.

It is said that after forty days and nights of fasting, "he hungered." He might have asked bread from heaven, and it would have been given to him, like the manna of old; or an angel might have been sent to him, as to Elijah under the juniper bush. But just then that was not God's way. The devil suggested to Jesus that the stones which lay about looked like loaves of bread, and that he could show his power by making them actual bread and eating thereof. At no other time in his life on earth did Jesus ever use his power to ameliorate his physical condition, not even to obtain water at the well when he was thirsty, nor to provide a place where he might lay his head, and be as comfortable as the birds and the foxes.

Jesus carried with him a quiver full of arrows when he went into the wilderness. The quiver was his own memory, and the arrows were the words of Scripture which he had learned as a Jewish boy in the synagogue and at his mother's knee. His divine wisdom was shown in the arrow which he chose to fling out against Satan: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." (Look this up in the Red Letter Bible, Deut. 8:3.) Jesus would have the devil know there was something higher to live for than to satisfy hunger. "Trust in God and do the right" is the way we would describe Jesus' attitude in modern language. Then the devil ceased attack on that line, but he opened up in another direction. We read "then the devil taketh him into the holy city, and he set him on the pinnacle of the temple." Surely the devil did not spirit Jesus away bodily, and carry him through space twenty miles and more away, for later on, to the end, Jesus was in the wilderness.

We read how Ezekiel was brought in the visions of God to Jerusalem, from far away Babylon, that he might behold the abominations committed there (Ezek. 8:1-12). We may think, in a somewhat similar way, that in a vision the devil took Jesus to the temple in Jerusalem, not that he might see abominations there, but a great opportunity to impress himself upon the people as their expected Messiah. A truly spectacular way was suggested—that he should permit himself to fall from the highest point in the temple, and be rescued by angels sent from heaven. Such an event would undoubtedly have won a large following for Jesus from the outset, but he knew that was not God's way, so he drew another arrow out of his quiver and let it fly at Satan: "Thou shalt not make trial of (shalt not tempt) the Lord thy God." (See Deut. 6:16, in Red Letter Bible.)

AN AGED FARMER'S PLEA

AN old, God-fearing farmer, living in Missouri, sends a very touching letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He owned a small farm on the Missouri River bottom, and was clear of debt and fairly prosperous when the overflow of 1903 swept all his crop. He was compelled to mortgage his home to procure money and supplies to enable his family to live. He tried to raise another crop, but a second overflow took it also. His misfortunes followed each other rapidly, like those of Job. There came still another wet season, and he was forced to sell his home. After a long Christian life, he found himself homeless and practicallly penniless. One son, a bright young man, felt called to be a preacher when only a boy, and it was the ambition of his father and mother to send him to college. They pinched and saved to do it. He is working his way through, and now needs only one year more to complete his training. He is a strong-hearted, loyal youth, and declares that as soon as he is ordained he will make a home for his parents. Meanwhile, the old farmer is "down and out" unless some good-hearted Samaritan comes to his aid. His "boy" does not know how the old folks are suffering, and the father doesn't wish him to know.

"In my better days," writes the old farmer, "I have always given of my means to the church and to the needy and other good causes. Now I find myself one of the needy. I pray that, by some means, I may be able to have a little home down here yet, which I can call my own—no matter how humble it is—and in which I can live during the short time allotted to me. I would like also to assist my son to get through; he is working very hard and scarcely taking enough rest, so anxious is he to succeed in his studies for the ministry. If some of our Christian people, who are blessed with means, knew of my case I think the Lord would put it into their hearts to help me. I don't want charity, and I have never asked aid of any one here, consequently my neighbors do not know my condition."

The aged writer encloses excellent references as to character, and several business citizens vouch for his integrity and uprightness. Will not some reader of this journal become personally interested in this most deserving case? We will be glad to give the name and address of the old farmer, and also his references, to any one who may write to us on the subject.
